We do not confine our admiration for brave and gallant deeds to our own citizens. We take our examples of human virtue, of human excellence, from every clime and from every government and every race of mankind; and shall the American Congress by refusing to pass their assent to this complimentary action of a foreign government, bestowed because of the gallantry of one of our citizens, undertake to exclude our own citizens from that roll of world-wide honor that the citizens of any other government shall be entitled to. Why, Mr. President, far from it. If an American citizen by unworthy conduct, by such apish tricks as the Senator from Texas has very justly condemned, should seek to obtain foreign approval, undoubtedly we can refuse our commendation of any such conduct; but God forbid that when honor is paid by a foreign people to American gallantry the voice of the American Senate should be found in opposition to it.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has once spoken, and under the rule he can proceed again by unanimous consent only.

Mr. PLUMB. I am waiting for somebody to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Kansas proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLUMB. I observe in the same line a number of bills pending before the Senate, one of them to permit the present minister to Russia to receive a snuff-box, I think it is, for the dangerous service which he performed in standing at the side of the czar on the occasion of his late coronation.

Mr. President, it is not the particular case that I object to, but it is this line of cases; and I believe now if there is any occasion for commending anybody in the United States Navy or the United States Army or in the diplomatic service of the United States for doing anything that is especially worthy of commendation, the American Government ought to do the commending and not leave it to some foreign nation. It is the running into that sort of thing which I object to more than to the particular case. I object to this because it is in a line with the request which has been preferred here in the name of our minister to Russia, and also with a request in regard to a gentleman who was recently abroad in some naval-commercial capacity—a commodore in the Navy, who was presented with certain Persian carpets and rugs and things of that kind while he was negotiating treaties of some sort. The trouble is, that we do not know where, and there is no proper line at which, to draw or enforce a rule of exclusion unless we adopt the rule, as I think we should, of excluding all of them. If we are to accept the judgment of the foreign countries tendering the decoration, then of course the testimony of the czar that our minister at his court stood in a very dangerous place and performed a heroic act in exposing himself to the volcanic difficulties and dangers with which royalty is attended in Russia ought to be recognized in the same manner.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to say that if an officer in a foreign navy had rendered a gallant service of that kind to one of our vessels I think we should like to express in some simple but honorable method our appreciation of the act, and we should regard it as a great discourtesy if any foreign government compelled its naval officer to fling in our faces our expression of gratitude. I think it would be almost a boorish act on the part of Congress to refuse this leave.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it be in order to ask the Senate to consider now a resolution which I had the honor to offer some time ago, and which stands as Order of Business No. 9 on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be in order under the rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider the resolution, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BUTLER December 10, 1883:

Resolved, That each Senator, except the chairmen of standing or select committees of the Senate, shall be entitled to a clerk or secretary, at a salary of $1,000 annually, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent, out of order, to proceed at this time with the consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not detain the Senate more than a moment, and simply to say that there are now forty-one Senators holding the position of chairmen of committees, standing or select, in the Senate, leaving thirty-five without clerical assistance; so that if the resolution pass it would involve the appointment of but thirty-five additional clerks for the Senate. In offering the resolution I had no design of increasing what are known as the personal perquisites of Senators. My object was simply to increase the clerical force of the Senate, and in my judgment increase the efficiency of the public service. I simply ask a vote upon the resolution without further remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 16, noes 10—not a quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. GARLAND. My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. I do not know how either would vote.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FARLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bowen,	Gibson,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Butler,	Hale,	Kenna,	Pugh,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Lapham,	Sewell,
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Vance.

Call,	Logan,	Sabin,
Cameron of Pa.,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Maxey,	Sawyer,

So the resolution was agreed to.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill regularly in order on the Calendar will be reported.

The bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky, $2,630.42, in full satisfaction for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care, and attention furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by order of the military authorities of the United States, in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report in that case be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON December 19, 1883:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson, having considered the same, beg leave to report:

That this committee had this case under consideration during the Fortieth, Forty-first, and Forty-fourth Congresses, and at each of said sessions made a favorable report thereon, which upon reconsideration they now adopt, as follows:

That Mrs. Carson is a widow, residing in Bourbon County, in the State of Kentucky, and was from August, 1862, to the latter part of the year 1865, the keeper of the jail in said county; that during that time the military authorities of the United States, then stationed in said county, took control of said jail as a military prison, and compelled her to furnish subsistence for conscripts and for deserters from the United States Army and prisoners taken from the rebel forces; that during said time she furnished subsistence, amounting in all to 4,384 days' subsistence for prisoners placed in said jail by said military authorities; that said authorities never paid a cent therefor; that said petitioner kept an accurate account of the number of days' subsistence thus furnished, which is filed with her petition, with evidence of the justice and truth thereof; that she also claims compensation for fire furnished in the prison for a portion of said time, and also for fuel furnished to the guards around the jail, and also for rent of said jail; and her charges for subsistence are at the rate of 75 cents per day, and for fire 35 cents per day, which were the rates allowed by law in that jail for keeping persons confined therein under the civil law. Her total claim, thus made out, amounts to the sum of $4,618.70.

Upon examination of the facts, and upon consideration of the case, the committee are of opinion to allow her 60 cents for each day's subsistence, making the sum of $2,630.40, in full discharge of her account. Accordingly they report the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES E. STEWART.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 47) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, $3,160.50, in full of all balances due the estate of Michael S. Stewart, growing out of a contract made on or about the 10th of December, 1864, between Stewart and Capt. George B. Hibbard, then assistant quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., by which Stewart agreed to cut and deliver 10,000 cords of wood at the Cumberland River for the use of the Army.

Mr. GARLAND. Let us have the report read in that case.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report is very long.

Mr. GARLAND. Then let there be an explanation of the case.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I can state in a moment the point in the claim. The bill was reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] who is now absent.

On the 10th of December, 1864, Michael S. Stewart entered into a verbal contract with a quartermaster named George B. Hibbard, by which he, Stewart, agreed to deliver to the United States 10,000 cords of wood on the banks of the Cumberland River at a point not exceeding twenty-five miles from the city of Nashville at $6 a cord. Mr. Stewart, for the purpose of carrying out the contract, purchased timber land adjacent to the river, hired choppers, and cut 2,000 cords of wood, which 2,000 cords of wood were delivered to the United States, received by the proper officer, and paid for. He also at that time, in addition to the 2,000 cords of wood, had cut 903 cords, but after the United States had received the 2,000 cords he was notified that they would not receive any more. Mr. Stewart, when he became satisfied that the United States would not receive any more wood, sold the 903 cords on the best terms he could. He sold that wood at $2.50 a cord. The occasion for the use of wood had passed, and consequently he could not obtain any more for the wood. This bill proposes to pay him for the actual expense that he was put to, less the amount that he received for the wood, in cutting and delivering on the banks of the river 903 cords. The amount is about $3,000.

Mr. MILLER, of California. When did this transaction take place?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The contract was entered into on the 10th of December, 1864.

Mr. MILLER, of California. When was the contractor notified that the wood would not be received?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it was in May, 1865, the next spring.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what evidence there is in this case. He speaks of the contract being a verbal contract. Does the contract call for a large number of cords?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Here is the statement of the quartermaster who entered into the contract:

ASSISTANT QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
FUEL AND FORAGE DEPARTMENT,
Nashville, Tenn., November 2, 1864.

To whom it may concern:

Mr. M. S. Stewart has contracted to deliver me 10,000 cords of wood on the Cumberland River for the use of the Government. He will need all of his hay and grain to feed his teams used in delivering said wood; therefore I request all persons whomsoever to leave his crops unmolested.

GEO. B. HIBBARD,
Captain and Assistant Quartermaster.

There is no question that he entered into a verbal contract with this quartermaster, to whom he agreed to deliver that amount of wood.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether the amount they have reported is the difference between $2.50 on 903 cords of wood and the $6 a cord?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is the difference between the actual cost of the wood to the contractor and the $2.50 a cord which he received—the actual damage that he suffered.

Mr. CONGER. Does that give the United States the land that he bought?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, sir, it does not; it has nothing to do with the land.

Mr. CONGER. Then what is the amount per cord, less the $2.50 allowed by this bill? Is it more than the original contract price?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, it is less than the original contract price of $6 a cord. The bill was reported favorably in the last Congress, and the report was concurred in by my distinguished friend from Michigan, who at that time was a member of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that simply means that there is no evidence of record that there was any dissent. I have no recollection about the case. I do not recollect that it was ever referred to me for examination.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was not reported by the Senator, but by another member of the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WRIGHT & FAHNESTOCK'S PATENT LINCHPIN.

The bill (S. 297) for the relief of Mrs. S. A. Wright and Mrs. C. Fahnestock was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Mrs. S. A. Wright, widow of the late George Wright, deceased, and Mrs. C. Fahnestock, widow of the late S. S. Fahnestock, deceased, of $5,000, in full consideration for the entire past and future use by the Government of the United States of the patent linchpin of George Wright and S. S. Fahnestock, on condition that a full, sufficient, and legal transfer and license is executed and deposited with the War Department, for the Government purposes, free of all charges of royalty.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the report be read or an explanation be made of that bill.

Mr. PLATT. The report is somewhat lengthy, and it will take some time to read it. I have no objection to the reading of the report. This bill has passed the Senate twice and the House once after a full investigation, and I did not suppose it would be necessary to take up time in discussing it or reading the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not care about it. The bill has been reported and acted on once before, according to the statement of the Senator.

Mr. PLATT. It has been passed twice by the Senate and once by the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET CASSIDY.

The bill (S. 298) for the relief of Mrs. Maggie Cassidy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Marguret Cassidy, widow of Peter A. Cassidy, deceased, $2,500, in full compensation for the past, present, and future use of the patent of said Peter A. Cassidy for his invention of machine for cutting vellum cloth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the bill be explained by some one. I see the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] made the report.

Mr. CALL. The bill is a very plain one. The Committee on Patents reported it favorably to the Senate and the Committee on Claims of the House have reported a similar bill. It is recommended by the Auditor of the Post-Office Department, and the amount of compensation named is recommended. The facts of the case are all certified by the Department. I apprehend there is no doubt about the propriety of the bill. The Government has had the use of the property, and the bill gives the Government a right to its future use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill for the relief of Margaret Cassidy."

CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes this occasion to call attention to Rule XXV, where the following language occurs:

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of three Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same.

The resolution that was offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is in the following language:

Resolved, That each Senator, except the chairmen of standing or select committees of the Senate, shall be entitled to a clerk or secretary, at a salary of $1,000 annually, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The attention of the Chair was not called to the rule at the time when the resolution was before the Senate. Obviously the action of the Senate was out of order under the rule. The resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. BUTLER. In reference to the point made by the presiding officer of the Senate, it strikes me that the Senate having considered the resolution by unanimous consent and having passed upon it by a yea-and-nay vote, its action has certainly cured whatever irregularity may have resulted from the resolution not having been referred to the committee. I was not aware of the existence of such a rule, or if I was aware of it it did not occur to me, and I had no purpose whatever of avoiding that committee in asking for the consideration of the resolution by the Senate. It seems to me that the Senate having considered it by unanimous consent and having passed it by a yea-and-nay vote, that action cures whatever defect may have occurred. I therefore think it is now the law of the Senate; it is indeed the law of Congress really, and it is too late to refer it to the committee now. I should not have the slightest objection to its going there, if that were desired; but I see no necessity for a reference. I shall, therefore, as far as I am concerned, allow it to remain as it is.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I voted with great pleasure for the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina, and I shall do so again, for I appreciate the absolute necessity of the relief which such action by the Senate would afford to members of this body. I am satisfied that in parliamentary law the rule just read from the Chair does not affect the validity of the action of the Senate, because the final vote upon the resolution after it was received and considered without objection cured all defects which might have been taken advantage of by entering an objection under the rule. But while that is my judgment, I still think it best under the circumstances that the vote by which the resolution was passed should be reconsidered. Such a resolution may be supposed by the public to affect Senators specially, and it may be regarded by persons who are too apt to criticise our actions as something of a personal favor to ourselves. In view of that I think it is decidedly best and most proper in every sense that it should go through every form which has been prescribed for such legislation. I shall continue to give it my support, and I have no doubt every other Senator who voted for it will; but for the present I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, with a view to its reference to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for the Territory of Alaska, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories to insert after section 12 the following additional section:

SEC. 13. That there shall be established in said Territory, at such places as may be designated by the Commissioner of Education, free public schools for the instruction of children and youths of proper age in the common elementary branches of study and in industrial pursuits. Such schools shall be open to all persons of the proper age, without regard to race, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Education. Where free schools have already been established by private benevolence or by any religious society the Commissioner of Education may, with the consent of such persons or society, adopt said schools as a part of the school system of said district, on such terms as may be agreed upon. The Commissioner of Education shall designate one of the best qualified teachers of said schools as superintendent of education, who shall have a general oversight and direction of all said schools, and shall annually report to the governor. All of the powers hereby given to the Commissioner of Education shall be executed subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I did not have an opportunity before the Senate adjourned yesterday to reply to what was said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] touching this bill. He contended that section 1891 of the Revised Statutes, title 23, was applicable to this Territory. I entirely disagree with the Senator in regard to that, and I take the position here that not one provision under this title relating to the Territories of the United States can be said to apply to the Territory embraced in this bill, and I say moreover that it was not intended that it should. There is, as I said to the Senate when I last had the floor on this subject, a special provision here requiring an exceptional oath to be taken by the officers who are to execute the laws in Alaska. It is in the following words:

Each of said officials—

Including the governor, the judge, the commissioners, the special constables, and all other officers in this Territory provided for in this bill—

Each of said officials shall before entering on the duties of his office take and subscribe an oath that he will faithfully execute the same, which said oath may be taken before the judge of said district or any United States district or circuit judge.

These officers are to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They are to be paid out of the public Treasury like all officers of the United States. Article 6 of the Constitution of the United States declares:

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

Now, I say that title 23 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Territories, will not operate within this Territory under this bill; and let me put a test to ascertain whether I am right or not in this position. If it be contended that section 1891 applies to this Territory, let me ask whether it is intended that section 1862 shall apply to this Territory. Both of these sections are to be found under the very same title. Section 1862 reads as follows:

Every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States to serve during each Congress, who shall be elected by the voters in the Territory qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly thereof.

I could read a great many more provisions under this title relating to the Territories which are mandatory in their character, but which, in my judgment, have no application to this Territory, any more than the provision referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, or that other provision under the same title requiring all officials to take and subscribe an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

It is very evident, Mr. President, that this bill does not intend to organize a Territory so as to bring it under the provisions of this title. I would ask the Senator from Indiana who has the bill in charge if in his opinion under the section I have read this Territory, after this bill passes, will be entitled to a Delegate in the other House?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think I can answer in general terms the question of the Senator from Florida. I think the general laws of the United States contained in the chapter of the Revised Statutes to which he has referred would have application to the Territory or district of Alaska as organized under the pending bill, except where they were inconsistent with the pending bill itself.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Anybody can readily see how far that auswer falls short of meeting the question addressed to the Senator. There is nothing in this bill inconsistent with the idea that a Delegate from the Territory should be in the other House. There is no provision made for an election whatever, no machinery looking to the carrying out of this provision of the Revised Statutes which I have read and which is just as obligatory as the one read by the Senator from Arkansas; and I say if that provision of the Revised Statutes which he read and the other relating to oaths and affirmations of officers in the Territory are operative, that relating to a Delegate must be operative too, because it says every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate. Now the question is whether this Territory comes within the classifications embraced in the Revised Statutes as an organized Territory. I say that it does not, and this bill indicates upon its face that it was not intended to come within it; otherwise this special oath would not have been incorporated into this bill.

The question is whether anybody who receives a commission from this Government to discharge the functions of a judge, or a governor, or a clerk of a court, can be permitted to enter upon the duties of his office by taking the special oath provided for in this statute reported by the committee. I say that he can not. If there is any force in what was said by the Senator from Arkansas, then all the provisions of this title 23 apply to this Territory. There is no provision made in the bill under consideration for a legislative assembly, and still the Revised Statutes, title 23, declare that every Territory organized under the authority of the United States shall have a legislative body. There is no legislative body provided for in the bill now under consideration. Therefore there is nothing inconsistent between the bill and the Revised Statutes; and I again ask the Senator if he thinks that the provisions of the Revised Statutes relating to Territories which provide for legislative assemblies in the Territories of the United States and for a Delegate from each Territory will apply to the Territory of Alaska?

This is either an organized Territory or it is not. If it is to be an organized Territory, I do not suppose that anybody will deny that the Territory would have a right to claim Territorial representation by a Delegate in the other House; and if that be true, this bill is greatly defective in not providing for the election of a Delegate to represent the people the Territory in the other end of the Capitol.

I read yesterday from the treaty under which this Territory was acquired, the third article of which guarantees to the citizens of the Territory all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. I presume the proper construction of that would be that the people in the Territory would have all the rights and privileges of people similarly situated in the Territories. It is well for us to understand exactly what we are doing, because this Territorial question is looming up to be a very important one. We are brought face to face at the present time with this mammoth Mormon question, about which there is considerable difference of opinion as to how far our power goes over that Territory. As we go on, it is well, I say, for us to understand exactly what we are doing. I have no hesitation in restating and reasserting that if the provision read by the Senator from Arkansas is operative in this Territory every one of the provisions of title 23 of the Revised Statutes must operate there that is not inconsistent with this special law, and there is nothing inconsistent in setting up a legislative power there.

If it be true that the oath required from officers of Territories in title 23 of the Revised Statutes is the one to be administered, why did the Committee on Territories incorporate this special oath in this bill? What necessity was there for putting a special oath into this bill which the officers of this Territory are to be required to take? Does not everybody know that when it comes to the discharge of their duties under this act of organization they never will go beyond this bill? It clearly indicates, as I said yesterday, that nobody had any idea that the Constitution or the general laws found in the Revised Statutes would have any force or operation in this Territory; and there is another provision in this bill which clearly carries out that idea—that is the one relating to the mining laws. If the general laws of the United States by their own simple force and operation went into this Territory without any action on the part of Congress, why was it necessary to specify particularly in this bill that the mining laws of the United States should have force and effect there, while nothing is said about any other description of laws?

This shows what was in the mind of the committee when they were considering this measure, that the general laws of the United States do not operate within a Territory unless carried there by the authority of Congress, and that is the true position. That has been the position held by the best minds in this Government from the time the question was first agitated. The Constitution of the United States, as appears by its preamble, was made for the States, and not for the Territories. It declares upon its face that "we, the people of the United States," or, to put it more tersely, the States united, "do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." It is well known to every thinker in the land that it was not intended at the time of the ratification of the Constitution that it should have any force or operation beyond the States whose delegates created it and whose people ratified it in their conventions; and when any new territory was subsequently acquired under the treaty-making power it was well settled that if the people were to get any advantage from the Constitution of the United States, thus created and ratified by the people of the States, they could only get it through the action of Congress in its legislative capacity in extending over them the benefits of this great organic law.

Now I say that title 23 of the Revised Statutes does not extend the Constitution over this Territory; neither does the bill under consideration; and the question is whether under the provisions of the treaty to which I called attention yesterday the people there have a right to it or not. I think they have; and I think that the usual provision incorporated in the Territorial bills ought to be in this, that the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall be extended to this Territory, and each of the officers there ought to be required to take the oath of office required from every officer of the United States, and the special oath provided for in this bill ought to be omitted from it, because it is calculated to deceive and delude. There is but one oath of office required of officers of the United States, and that is provided for by the Constitution. It does not leave it to Congress to say what oath shall be taken. The Constitution says that all officers of the United States shall take an oath to support the same, and it leaves nothing for Congress to do on the subject so far as that matter is concerned except possibly to regulate the details of reducing it to writing, or something of that kind.

This proposed statute brings up a special oath that the officers of this Territory shall be required to take inconsistent with the other, as I went on to say. If the provisions of the title relating to Territories apply to it, then I am free to say that my objection is not well taken; but the moment the friends of this bill, and I am not its enemy by any means, admit that the section referred to by the Senator from Arkansas extends to this Territory, then they must admit that every other provision in this title not inconsistent with the act under consideration will go there too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories as a thirteenth section.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I always listen with interest to the constitutional discussion in which the Senator from Florida engages, and I have listened to this impractical discussion of some supposed difficulties which he has found in this bill with interest. If the Senator has any doubts upon these questions which did not raise doubts in the minds of the members of the Committee on Territories, and is not an enemy to this bill, as he says——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I suggest that he endeavor to forward the purposes of the friends of the measure by some practical amendments which shall avoid the difficulties that he finds in this bill. To me they are very shadowy; they do not seem to be real at all. But if the Senator from Florida finds any difficulty in what is said in this bill as to the form of oath which shall be administered to the officers to be appointed under it, I suggest that he propose an amendment at the proper time, striking out the words which require an officer to swear to faithfully discharge the duties of his office and inserting that he shall take the oath required by law. To such an amendment there could be no possible objection. Indeed, the general statutes of the United States now specifically declare what oath every officer shall take, and there was no intention on the part of the committee of providing any special or peculiar oath to be taken by these officers, and if the phraseology is such as to be subject to the criticism of the Senator from Florida, that is a mere matter of phraseology which the committee would readily correct upon a suggestion.

Now, Mr. President, upon the other point. If the Senator has any trouble upon the question whether the inhabitants of this Territory, when this bill shall be passed, will be living under the Constitution and general laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, I suggest that when the proper time comes he endeavor to give force to that suggestion by some appropriate amendment which will show his friendliness to the bill and that this discussion was not one to embarrass its passage.

But, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that we are attempting here some legislation that is sui generis in some respects in the organization of this great Territory of Alaska. It was not believed that we should confer upon the few people residing there a full territorial organization. We have described this Territory as a civil district, and have organized for it a government simple in form, inexpensive in its character, and yet one that we believe will be efficient to bring to every resident of the Territory, and to every home that is established there, the reasonable protection of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that will banish that reign of lawlessness which has existed there since the great Empire of Russia surrendered its control to the Government of the United States. We have made it simple and inexpensive because we supposed it would better meet the views of those who feel the necessity for some government for Alaska, but do not believe that we should go to the expense of a full Territorial organization.

That there are difficulties connected with framing such a government we all realize. We have given to this Territory an executive head; we have given to it a judicial officer, with four subordinate judicial officers in the form of United States court commissioners; we have given it a marshal and a clerk and an attorney, so that the Government may properly be represented in those courts in the defense of its interests, and that each one of them may be accessible to every citizen of the Territory in the assertion of his own personal rights and in the defense of his person against aggressors and criminals.

Mr. President, I did not believe, I do not believe now, that it is necessary to address any argument to the United States Senate in favor of a civil government in Alaska. As the committee say in the brief report which was submitted, the duty is so obvious that it can not be made more forcible or plain by any discussion. We are under treaty obligation, as the Senator from Florida has said, to provide these people with such a government. If there were no treaty, I insist that as a Government we are under a duty on every foot of American territory to extend over every American home and over every American citizen the full protection of the laws, and to provide for every such citizen, however remote he may live from the great centers of population, a reasonably convenient access to a properly constituted court for the arbitrament of his differences. I did not suppose when this bill was brought to a hearing in the Senate that I should at all advance the interests of the cause of Alaska by introducing it by any elaborate defense of its provisions; and though there was here a not uninviting opportunity for an oration, one that had been availed of in earlier times by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts in a most masterly and classical oration, one that had been availed of by the distinguished Senator and Secretary from the State of New York in speeches made out of the Senate, I supposed I should best advance the interests of this measure by allowing it to come at once to the attention of the Senate without any preliminary discussion at all.

I was surprised to hear yesterday from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] a reopening of the question whether we had done wisely in purchasing Alaska. I know that for years after the purchase it was called "Seward's Folly." I know there were many who regarded it as a great waste of public treasure that we should have procured this which was supposed to be an utterly barren and inhospitable and frozen region by the expenditure of $7,200,000 of the public money, but I had supposed that we had so far penetrated those misconceptions, the lack of knowledge and ignorance which invested Alaska at the time of its purchase to the common mind, that the question would not now be raised whether there might not be found better reasons for the purchase of Alaska than those of geographical symmetry and manifest destiny. I believe that as a mere commercial bargain this Government has rarely made a better one. We have already received from the Alaska Commercial Company, from a single source, the only one that has been laid under any tribute to the national Treasury, more than one-half of the original expenditure, and there are awaiting there now sources of Government revenue that, when they are brought in, will vastly add to this annual income which we are receiving from Alaska.

Mr. President, Alaska can hardly be described, either as to its climate or resources, in a phrase or two. The Territory is said to be 1,500 miles one way and 2,000 miles the other, and that gentleman who would undertake to describe it in a single phrase, in a single epigrammatic sentence, must have better facility even than the Senator from Kansas has in that direction to state correctly the climatic and agricultural and mineral resources of that great country.

Mr. President, I am not to be enticed now into any detailed discussion of the resources of Alaska. I am here putting the application for civil government for its people not upon the ground that we made a good bargain, not upon the ground that there are resources there to be developed which will add to the national wealth, but solely upon the ground that we owe it as a duty to the population that resides there. When we speak of that population as being only the four or five hundred white citizens who were resident there in 1880, when the census returns were made up, we are not taking a large enough view of the question. The Senator from Kansas supposed these to be those annual visitors for gain to the Territory of Alaska who return in the fall season to homes in a more pleasant clime.

Mr. President, these were enumerated four years ago as the actual white residents of the Territory, and I have been informed by those who know that the class the Senator describes amounts to several thousand annually, who go to that Territory into its mines, who go there into its lumber camps, who go there into its fisheries, and who spend the season that may be given to these pursuits and then return to their homes southward on the Pacific coast. But, in addition to these, there is a large Indian population there and, as the Secretary of the Interior says in his report, at least as to one class of these Indians, if they cannot be classed as civilized, neither are they savage. They are a peaceful, industrious, laboring population; they live upon the coast; they build houses; they are the laborers in the lumber camps that have been established there; they are not at all of the description of Indians that we are in the habit of dealing with in the central portions of this continent; they are not Sioux or Apaches, but they are a class of Indians who are ready to take hold of every opportunity that is offered for honest employment out of which they can earn a living. Now to these we owe a duty, the duty of giving them government.

Mr. President, when the Russian schools were established there, it is of record that several of the native boys were brought so far forward in the higher branches of study that one of them actually made the triangulation of the sea-coast and the coast of those islands upon which our present surveys are based. It is believed by those who have been brought in contact with them that they are capable of a speedy and rapid development if schools are established among them. And, Mr. President, they do not have to be dragged into the schools. I have seen it stated in a book upon Alaska, published by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, as having been said by a sailor who had lived at Sitka, speaking of these people, that they were a people mad after education. I have heard from a missionary who has been there several times that every school-house which has been built by private benevolence or the associated efforts of the churches has been filled immediately after it was completed, and has been found inadequate to contain those who pressed into it for instruction.

Mr. President, the assault here has been chiefly made, at least it has developed, upon that section of the bill which provides education for Alaska. I have been surprised that it should be so. I am sure the distinguished Senators from Kansas do not intend to put themselves in opposition to that which is certainly the most beneficent provision of the bill. I say to the Senator [Mr. PLUMB] that the committee are not at all wedded to the phraseology of this bill, that if the section now under discussion seems to him to be too broad, to involve too much the idea of a school system, the committee have no possible objection that it shall be simplified and limited in its terms. They only desire that there shall be here a suitable appropriation for education, and that its expenditure and use shall be committed to the Commissioner of Education under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to suggest that possibly this should be coupled with the general appropriations for Indian education, and should be used as those appropriations are used. The Senator disaffirms my impression of his remarks.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me a word. I did not have in mind that this expenditure should be according to the method by which money is expended among the Indians in our own land here particularly, but under the same general supervision, so that there may not be two conflicting systems; that was all. I recognize as well as the Senator from Indiana the difference between these Aleutians and the Indians, those who go by that name in this country. I recognize the fact that they must be treated in a different manner; but to me the trouble is that I do not know what the best manner is, and I suggest to the Senator whether he and his committee are quite certain that they have got the best mode. I go hand and heart with the Senator and his committee as far as they desire to go in the expenditure of money to accomplish the very purposes the Senator desires. I am only troubled lest the Senator in undertaking to prescribe a cast-iron rule will find when he gets it there that it is inapplicable to the condition of things for which it was designed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I fail to see what there is in this bill or in its provisions relating to education that can be aptly described as prescribing any iron rule. It is provided in the section under discussion that the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall establish free public schools. As I have already said in addressing myself particularly to the Senator from Kansas, if it is thought best that all that shall be left out and that we shall have simply a provision making an appropriation of a given sum of money to be expended by the Commissioner of Education under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as one of the committee I see no objection whatever. I would not care to antagonize such an amendment, and it seems to me that perhaps that suggestion—I do not know how my associates on the committee may feel—may meet and obviate the objections which have been made by the Senator from Kansas to this section.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will indulge me a moment I will say that I have drawn an amendment, which I will read now in order to ascertain whether it covers the point according to the opinion of the Senator from Indiana:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make equal and proper provision for the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, until such time as permanent provision shall be made for the same; and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I see no objection to that.

Mr. HOAR. Is that amendment a substitute for the thirteenth section?

Mr. PLUMB. A substitute for the thirteenth section.

Mr. HARRISON. It would be a substitute for the thirteenth and fourteenth sections.

Mr. PLUMB. It would take the place of both. It obviates the complaint I made yesterday in regard to this section as authorizing particular specific things to be done without reference to the existence of the knowledge which would enable those things to be done properly, or at all events enable Congress to know the fact those were the particular things proper to be done, besides uprooting, as I thought unnecessarily, the system of private schools existing in the Territory. In addition to that, the system of Indian education is now carried on under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The question as to how far we shall spend money in this direction ought to come up in the report provided for in section 12. Besides, the Commissioner of Education has never yet had deposited with him any such function as to directly interfere with or concern himself about the teaching of anybody, the carrying on of schools; but it has been his duty to collect statistics, diffuse information, &c., and it is a question to my mind as to how far we ought in this way to depart from that general law.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator either read or send his amendment to the desk to be reported, that I may understand it exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will report the amendment for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make needful and proper provision for the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, until such time as permanent provision shall be made for the same; and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator to make that $40,000 instead of $25,000, so that it may be understood that no effort to change phraseology here is animated by a spirt of cramping at all the purposes of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the Senator's suggestion, that the amount be $40,000?

Mr. DAWES. Forty thousand dollars instead of $25,000.

Mr. BUTLER. The committee agreed on the sum of $25,000 after a full discussion on that point, and it seems to me that is quite enough to begin with. I think the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will meet the difficulties on all sides, and I trust, therefore, the chairman of the committee will accept it. As far as I am concerned as a member of the Committee on Territories I entirely concur with it.

Mr. PLUMB. I am glad to say in regard to the amount that I have no objection to any amount which anybody can show with any degree of reason will be necessary; but I do not believe it will be possible to prudently expend more than $25,000 in the time that will elapse until the matter can be brought before Congress, accompanied by the report which is provided to be made to enable us to go ahead. If it shall be, however, I have no objection to a larger sum than that named by me.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator from South Carolina has said, $25,000 was agreed on in the committee as the amount which I was instructed to move to fill this blank with.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to press an excessive sum. If the committee have determined that $25,000 is as far as can be prudently and wisely expended, I withdraw any suggestion of any increase of that sum. My own opinion is that in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior not a dollar will be expended beyond the limitations of wisdom and prudence in the administration of the fund.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas which has been read for our information, I make no objection to it except in one particular: The committee did believe that the control of these schools and the expenditure of this money should be in the hands of the Commissioner of Education rather than that the fund should be expended through the Indian Department. These Indians in Alaska have never yet become public charges. We have not been asked to make any appropriations in the way of annuities for them. If the question is wisely dealt with we shall never be asked to do so. Now as the management of Indian schools under the Indian Department has connected itself with the system of annuities, treaty annuities or annuities by special grants of Congress, I believe that it would be wiser to put the subject of education in Alaska in the hands of the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and if my friend from Kansas will make his amendment read that the Commissioner of Education, under the Secretary of the Interior, shall do so and so, I will cheerfully accept it.

Mr. PLUMB. I can not do that with my conviction as to the proper method of legislation, and for this reason, if for no other: I think it has been found by experience to be unwise to deposit discretion directly with a subordinate, as I have observed the increasing disposition of this body and of Congress to give directions to the heads of Departments, to put the responsibility directly on them for the exercise of power, and not name the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Commissioner of Education for the performance of particular duties, but to deposit the responsibility along with the power in the Secretary of the Interior, and let him supervise the subordinate so as to make it affirmatively his business in the first instance, and not let the whole machinery be started and carried on in a certain way, and only come to his notice in the way of finding out whether he approves it or not.

Mr. HARRISON. As a general observation what the Senator from Kansas has said is well; but where can it be inappropriate that here, when there are two agencies in the Department of the Interior to which this may be committed, Congress should in this shape indicate its preference between the two? I think there is in what I have suggested a reason why it would be better that the control of these schools in Alaska should be separated from the general system of Indian schools connected with our annuities and should be under the management of the Bureau of Education.

Mr. PLUMB. In response to that I would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Bureau of Education has never yet had given to it the authority to carry on a school; it is entirely foreign to the purpose of its creation, and unless we are prepared now to begin to graft on to that system the particular management of individual schools, of individual children, the selection of teachers, and things of that kind, it seems to me we ought not to deposit that authority there in regard to this exceptional case. The Secretary of the Interior having both of these agencies under his control, and having besides both classes of scholars to provide for, to wit, Indian scholars and white scholars, can say which of these two he will use, or perhaps he may use both; but we certainly are not in as good condition to apportion that responsibility as he is. We can not tell, as I think, so well as he which side will be the preponderating one, whether that of the Indians or of the whites, and we can not very well apportion that ourselves and say so much for this purpose and so much for the other.

I think the most natural and proper disposition of the money is to give it to the Secretary of the Interior, and we then have got it in a place where we have some one directly responsible to us, who reports to us and who is amenable to our jurisdiction more particularly and perfectly, I think, than the Commissioner of Education is or can be.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Mr. President, we have come so far toward an agreement upon this question and the sense of the Senate will be presently tested by a vote upon it. I have expressed my views, and I do not care to detain the Senate longer. I am glad that we have come so near to an agreement as to what should be done.

It is true, as the Senators from Kansas have said, that there are very few white children there, and they being so few and being so widely scattered, it seemed to me, as I said yesterday, that any limitation upon this educational provision that should exclude them from the benefit of the schools in this transition and temporary condition in which we place this Territory of Alaska would be unreasonable and unfair.

We provide in this bill for a report from some of these officers who are appointed, who are constituted a commission. When we have derived the information which their first report will give us it will doubtless then be in a condition where we can inaugurate such legislation as will bring under contribution in the Territory that class of property to which the Senator from Kansas yesterday referred as being appropriately subject to such burdens as a school tax. But as we are now, with no titles established in the Territory, and without any system of assessment or collection, it would be futile for us to attempt to inaugurate such a system. I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, with the amendment which I have suggested, may finally meet the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question as the chairman of the Committee on Territories. What is there of an exceptional character with respect to the population of this Territory that requires the intervention of this Government more than in any other Territory?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know any other unorganized Territory that this country has.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, this bill proposes to organize it. If the people there are in an exceptional condition so as to require this expenditure of money for their education we ought to understand it it it is not to be a general rule. We have a great many other Territories.

Mr. HARRISON. I respond to the Senator from Florida that I believe the Congress of the United States and the educated sentiment of this country has already, not only in thought, but in the legislation which has been adopted by Congress, come to the conclusion that there is a duty with reference to the Indian tribes, certainly on the part of the Government, to provide educational facilities; that instead of warring with them as savages, as a mere matter of economy it would be cheaper to educate them, and every year in our appropriation bills—the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] can correct me if I am wrong—I think in the last appropriation bill nearly half a million dollars was appropriated. I speak now outside of treaty stipulations; it seems to me it was $400,000, outside of any treaty obligations we were under, that we appropriated for the education of Indian children. This is directly in line with that legislation, and the only ground of exception at all is that it includes whatever white children there may be now resident in the Territory temporarily.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to speak then of the Indian children?

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] was right yesterday in saying that as to the white children there were few there; he may have been right in his guess that there were not more than twenty-five; but the smaller the number the smaller the occasion that we should so frame the bill as to exclude them.

Mr. HOAR. What is the number of Indian children?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts asks me the number of Indian children. I have been told that in the schools already established in southeastern Alaska by private benevolence and by the churches there are now 1,000 scholars, and that the limit of the schools is simply the limit of the buildings and the capacities of the teachers to take care of them.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me, if that be true, the Senator should have insisted on the $40,000 suggested by my colleague rather than the $25,000, which must be an entirely inadequate provision, because we have not only to provide for instruction, but provide in the first instance school buildings and apparatus, and this sum of $25,000 is not the cost of one of probably twenty school-houses that you can find in any of our populous towns or cities.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree that the appropriation is inadequate; indeed, I am willing to confess upon the challenge of almost any Senator here that all the provisions of the bill are inadequate. It is a mere shift; it is a mere expedient; it is a mere beginning in what we believe to be the right direction toward giving a civil government and education to Alaska. I hope more will follow, but the committee in considering this matter adjudged what they believed to be the probable limit of the generosity of the Senate. If we have undervalued their generosity, I regret it. For myself I would rather have seen $40,000 in the bill than $25,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the condition of Alaska has occupied much attention, especially in the religious and educational press of the country, for several years, and there is no doubt among the best citizens of the United States a feeling that the Government has neglected its duty, not alone its ordinary duty to the people who are within our jurisdiction, but its covenanted duty under the treaty with Russia to the people of that region.

Since this bill came up for consideration there has been put in my hands a very interesting paper, with a request that I present it to the Senate, but it was useless to offer it and refer it to the committee, for the bill was before us. I therefore take this occasion to present it, and shall ask the Senate that I may, out of order, submit it now as a memorial and lay it on the table, and I hope it may be published in the RECORD. It is a memorial from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. I need not say anything about the diginity of that body or its influence.

The General Assemby of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, in session at Saratoga Springs, May, 1883, appointed a special committee, consisting of Rev. Drs. Herrick Johnson, of Chicago; J. Addison Henry, of Philadelphia; Byron Sunderland, of Washington; George L. Spinning, of Cleveland; Henry Kendall, of New York; and William C. Roberts, of New Jersey; Justice William Strong, of Washington, and Hon. John Hill, of New Jersey, to wait on the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior in relation to civil government and industrial schools for Alaska.

These gentlemen were instructed to ask of the Government "the establishment of civil government among these people of Alaska, and pressing upon it the necessity of establishing industrial schools in that Territory."

They very briefly and compactly argue the question, submitting some facts upon the very points that have been discussed during the past half hour. Their resolution presses two considerations: first, the need of civil government; and, secondly, the need of industrial schools in Alaska.

Under the first head they say, and it may suffice as an answer to what the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] has just said, that we should establish a civil government in Alaska, because we promised Russia that we would do so in these words:

The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years; but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may, from time to time, adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country.

It need not be set forth here that we have totally neglected conferring upon those people the rights or allowing to them the privileges that citizens of the United States enjoy. Secondly, they ask for a government on the ground that the President of the United States has repeatedly recommended it, a fact with which the Senate is familiar, and on the ground that certain companies and enterprises "organized to develop the resources of Alaska have found it impossible to secure their rights without courts of justice." I have this very day heard from a citizen that certain would-be settlers in Alaska have been driven out from and been compelled to abandon certain mining operations, driven out by a lawless, disorganized body of men from British Columbia. They had no resource but to abandon their work or open fire upon their aggressors. There are no courts, no marshals. The mob came down after they had established their mills and their water-works in order to conduct what they believed would be a successful system of mining. There are no courts, no officers to maintain our own citizens in their rights in the Territory. The memorialists ask for this government also—

On the ground that large and influential bodies of Christians, besides those represented by this committee, feel the need of it.

These gentlemen do not urge it upon any ground chargeable to sentimentalism. It is because they have considered the subject, and because they have organized successful schools there and conducted them at very considerable expenditure of money, having partially redeemed the obligation of this Government through the contributions of private benevolence. They give an extract in this memorial from one of the reports of the Secretary of the Interior, which answers an inquiry just made by a Senator concerning the population of Alaska.

It appears that—

The total population of the Territory of Alaska is not far from 30,000. Of this number about 5,000 are Aleuts, who are not barbarians if they are not of the highest order of civilization.

The Senator from Indiana stated that—

Before the cession—

Mark this—

Before the cession by Russia good schools were maintained among them, but since the cession the schools have been discontinued, and the adult Aleut who received his education under the Russian Government, and at its expense, sees his children growing up without education.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his very last report says:

If the published statements in reference to Alaska be true we are doing much less for the civilization of these people than was done before we took possession of that country. The Russian Government gave them laws, churches, and schools; the American Government has done nothing in that direction.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs asks for $25,000 for the support of industrial schools there. Other considerations these gentlemen set forth. They say that it is a matter of justice that we should give these people a form of government and support these industrial schools, because we have obtained a very considerable revenue from that region.

The Senator from Indiana roughly estimated our receipts at half what we had given for the Territory. I understand, from those who know precisely, that over $4,000,000 have been paid into the Treasury by the Fur Seal Company. Of course there are no facilities for education there except such as the Government may provide, excepting a few schools established by missionary effort and by the Fur Seal Company.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent out of order to present this memorial and lay it upon the table, and that it may appear in the RECORD.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have summarized it sufficiently, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on the reading?

Mr. INGALLS. I wanted to be more definitely advised than the Senator from Connecticut had been able to inform us as to the actual number of the white and Indian population in the Territory of Alaska, and I thought perhaps the reading of the petition in extenso might give us that enumeration.

Mr. HAWLEY. The memorial does not attempt to reproduce the census, but it quotes from the Secretary of the Interior that there are 30,000 inhabitants there, of whom 5,000 are Aleuts in a somewhat advanced state of civilization.

Mr. INGALLS. And are the other 25,000 whites?

Mr. HAWLEY. The other 25,000 are chiefly the so-called uncivilized tribes. None of them, however, I think, are in the condition of the extremely barbarous Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the memorial at this time? The Chair hears none. It is received, and will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, in session at Saratoga Springs, May, 1883, appointed a special committee, consisting of Rev. Drs. Herrick Johnson of Chicago, J. Addison Henry of Philadelphia, Byron Sunderland of Washington, George L. Spinning of Cleveland, Henry Kendall of New York, and William C. Roberts of New Jersey, Justice William Strong of Washington, and the Hon. John Hill of New Jersey, to wait on the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior in relation to civil government and industrial schools for Alaska.

THE RESOLUTION OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, in session at Saratoga Springs, May, 1883, took the following action:

"In view of the pressing needs of Alaska, where our missions have been singularly successful, we recommend that the general assembly appoint a committee of eight persons, who shall wait upon the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior, asking of the Government through them the establishment of civil government among these people of Alaska, and pressing upon them the necessity of establishing industrial schools in that Territory."

The above resolution contains two items: First, the need of civil government; and, secondly, the need of industrial schools in Alaska.

The committee would urge upon the Government to grant the people of Alaska a government.

First. On the ground that it is promised them in the treaty existing between the United States and his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, which is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years, but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyments of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may, from time to time, adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country."

Second. On the ground that his excellency the President of the United States, in the exercise of the functions of his office as the Chief Executive of the nation, thinks that Alaska should have a government, and has so stated in his messages to Congress December 4, 1882, and December 4, 1883.

President Arthur's message to Congress, December 4, 1882:

"Alaska is still without any form of civil government. If means were provided for the education of its people, and for the protection of their lives and property, the immense resources of the region would invite permanent settlements and open new fields for industry and enterprise."

President Arthur's message to Congress, December 4, 1883:

"I trust that Congress will not fail at the present session to put Alaska under the protection of law. Its people have repeatedly remonstrated against our neglect to afford them the maintenance and protection expressly guaranteed by the terms of the treaty whereby that Territory was ceded to the United States. For sixteen years they have pleaded in vain for that which they should have received without the asking. They have no law for the collection of debts, the support of education, the conveyance of property, the administration of estates, or the enforcement of contracts; none, indeed, for the punishment of criminals, except such as offend against certain customs, commerce, and navigation acts. The resources of Alaska, especially in fur, mines, and lumber, are considerable in extent and capable of large development, while its geographical situation is one of political and commercial importance. The promptings of interest, therefore, as well as considerations of honor and good faith, demand the immediate establishment of civil government in that Territory."

Third. On the ground that certain companies organized to develop the resources of Alaska have found it impossible to secure their rights without courts of justice, and have petitioned the honorable Secretary of the Interior to protect them in the following words:

"Alaska has never been organized by Congress into a Territory. It has no government, no laws (excepting those pertaining to customs and to intercourse and with the Indians), no court, no judicial or executive officer; and therefore the undersigned have no means whatever of enforcing their rights, or protecting or developing their property, or of preventing its spoliation at the hands of unauthorized persons. Under the treaty with Russia, by which the Territory was ceded to the United States, the United States guaranteed, at least as far as the Russian subjects were concerned, protection to life, liberty, and property; and the undersigned are led to believe, and are so advised, that in the absence of any government, or any other method of redressing their wrongs, the Department of the Interior, with its general jurisdiction over the lands of the United States, has the jurisdiction to determine the rights of the undersigned as citizens of the United States, and to enforce these rights."

Fourth. On the ground that large and influential bodies of Christians besides those represented by this committee feel the need of it.

The Baptists, at their annual meeting in May, 1883, ordered the following to be sent to the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior:

"Resolved, That as Alaska is the only section of the United States where governmental or local aid has not been furnished for the education of the people;

"And as the establishment of schools will assist in civilizing the native population, prevent Indian wars, and prepare them for citizenship:

"Therefore the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, in session at Saratoga Springs, May, 1883, would respectfully petition you to renew your recommendation to Congress for an educational appropriation for Alaska."

The committee of the General Assembly urge, secondly, the need of industrial schools in Alaska:

First. On the ground that the people do not enjoy, as promised them by the Government, the advantages of education enjoyed under the Russian Government. (See extracts from the reports of the honorable Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.)

Extract from annual report for 1883 of Hon. H. M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, pages 47 and 48:

"The total population of the Territory of Alaska is not far from 30,000. Of this number about 5,000 are Aleuts, who are not barbarians, if they are not of the highest order of civilization. Before the cession by Russia good schools were maintained among them, but since the cession the schools have been discontinued, and the adult Aleut who received his education under the Russian Government, and at its expense, sees his children growing up without education. Suitable provision should be made for the education of the children of the Aleuts, which can be done without great expense. Also an appropriation ought to be made for the maintenance of at least two manual-labor schools for the education of the children of the less civilized Indians."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his annual report, December, 1883, to Congress, says:

"Attention should be again called to the need of schools for the Indians in Alaska. From the best information that can be obtained the Indians of Alaska number about 20,000, and since that country came into possession of the United States these people have had no aid for schools from this Government. * * * If the published statements in reference to Alaska be true, we are doing much less for the civilization of these people than was done before we took possession of that country. The Russian Government gave them laws, churches, and schools; the American Government has done nothing in that direction.

"In my estimates for the next fiscal year I have asked for an appropriation of $25,000 for the support of industrial schools in Alaska. I earnestly hope that this very modest sum will be granted. These Indians need no subsistence, no clothing, no implements, no agencies, but they beg for an education and it is discreditable to an enlightened Government to longer deny their request."

Second. On the ground that the Indians of Alaska, like the Indians elsewhere, are the wards of the nation, as far as their education at least is concerned.

Extract from General Eaton's report:

"From the census of 1880 we learn that there are about 30,000 people in Alaska; and of these it is believed there are about 10,000 children or young people, who ought to have some school privileges.

"With regard to this people, it may be observed—

"(1) That they are docile, peaceful, and have here and there some knowledge of useful industries; are apt in the mechanical arts, and anxious for instruction.

"(2) They are a self-supporting people, needing no annuities, clothing, or rations from the Government, but do need teachers, that they can not procure for themselves. These teachers should instruct them not only in letters but in the arts of civilized life and the duties of American citizenship.

"(3) If given an opportunity for this kind of instruction for a few years they would, it is believed, make good progress in throwing off tribal relations and in preparation to become an integral portion of the American people, thus contributing to the common wealth and prosperity of the country.

"(4) It is well known that civilization in approaching an untutored people may be their destruction by sending its vices before its virtues. It is equally well known that various weeds spring up spontaneously where useful plants must be cultivated, and that not neglect but pains-taking care is necessary to the improvement of the human mind.

"The people of Alaska, having received some measure of aid from the Russian Government, have expected the same from the United States. The natives, already to a limited extent demoralized by the introduction of intemperance and disease, it is thought would, by the introduction of schools, be prepared better to resist these evils and stand a far better chance to be a permanent and prosperous race.

"(5.) The development of the fishing interests, the discovery of gold, and the increase of commerce in that region are now calling public attention to it, and the time seems to have arrived when school privileges should be immediately provided. In 1870 Congress appropriated $50,000 for educational purposes in Alaska, which, on account of difficulties of administration at that time, was not expended there. This amount could now be expended there, I am sure, with most satisfactory results.

"In accordance, therefore, with these considerations, and in order not to come short of any duty required of me by law, I have the honor to recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate $50,000 for the establishment and maintenance of schools for instruction in letters and industry at such points in Alaska as shall be designated by the honorable Secretary of the Interior."

Third. On the ground of justice, as a return for revenue received by the Government from that part of the country.

Extract from a letter by Mr. Wendell Phillips:

"Alaska has poured millions into the Treasury, and one-third of what we have annually received would suffice for the whole expense of a government and schools. If we were called upon to make a beginning and introduce law and education, there might be a shadow of an excuse in this delay. But Russia has provided for both, and when we bought the province we had but to continue what she had established. From every point of view the condition of Alaska is a disgrace to our Government, and calls for immediate action. Cease to receive revenue from Alaska, or give her an equivalent by protecting life and property, securing peace, and offering to every man, woman, and child the means of fitting themselves for citizenship and their duties."

Fourth. On the ground that there are no other schools near which they can attend.

Extract from Dr. Sheldon Jackson's address:

"The nearest school of the kind to Alaska is at Forest Grove, Oreg. But Forest Grove is 1,500 miles distant from southeastern Alaska and 2,500 miles away, by present routes of travel, from southwestern Alaska. Then the resources and character of the two countries are different. Oregon is largely agricultural, while Alaska has very little agricultural interests.

"As the object of an industrial training is to enable the boy, upon arriving at manhood, to earn a support that will sustain his family in a civilized way, it is important to train him to utilize the resources of his own country.

"The resources of Alaska, in addition to her fur-bearing animals, are her vast supply of fish and great forests.

"Therefore the training-school of her children should be on the coast, where they can be taught navigation and seamanship, the handling of boats and sails, improved methods of fishing and handling fish-nets, improved methods of salting, canning, and preparing fish for market; a saw-mill, a carpenter-shop, cooper-shop, boot and shoe shop, &c.—a school where they can be taught both the theory and practice under such conditions as they shall meet with when they shall be able to support themselves."

In view of the fact that the President and the Secretary of the Interior have already recommended a civil government and industrial schools for Alaska, this committee deem it within their province and the spirit of their appointment to present the matter to the legislative departments of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Territories as section 13.

Mr. PLUMB. I have offered a substitute for the thirteenth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas sent to the desk an amendment that was read for information. Does the Senator now propose it?

Mr. PLUMB. I now move it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that his amendment would cover the provisions both of sections 13 and 14.

Mr. PLUMB. I supposed that if my amendment was agreed to now, when we reached section 14 it simply would not be adopted, and would be dropped out.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire then to move an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be reported, and then it will be in order to propose any amendment the Senator from Indiana desires.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out sections 13 and 14, as reported from the committee, and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make needful and proper provision for the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, until such time, as permanent provision shall be made for the same; and the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HARRISON. In the first line of the amendment, after the word "the," I move to insert "Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make needful and proper provision, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Territories, proposed as section 13, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 14. That the provisions of chapter 3, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the unorganized Territory of Alaska, shall remain in full force, except as herein specially otherwise provided; and the President of the United States shall also be authorized to restrict, regulate, or prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that is rather an onerous duty to be devolved upon the President, putting upon him the responsibility of regulating or prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in that Territory. I therefore move in line 5, after the word "the," to strike out down to and including the word "the" in line 6, in the following words: "President of the United States shall also be authorized to restrict, regulate, or prohibit the;" and after the word "district," in line 7, to insert the words "is hereby prohibited;" so as to read:

And the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. Chapter 3 of title 23 of the Revised Statutes, to which reference is made in the section under consideration, reads as follows:

SEC. 1955. The President shall have power to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of fire-arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into and within the Territory of Alaska.

This bill simply enlarges the powers which are conferred by section 1955 so as to provide for the regulation or prohibition under the same terms as the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits within the Territory. We thought that would accomplish practically all that we ought to undertake, and therefore placed the section in the condition in which it is found in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be better to prohibit it altogether?

Mr. HARRISON. If so, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas whether his amendment is not so framed that it takes from the President the discretion which he has here as to the importation? It would be vain to prohibit simply the manufacture within the Territory if the President's views as to importation should be in conflict with the law as to the manufacture and sale.

Mr. PLUMB. I will modify my amendment by inserting the word "importation" before "manufacture;" so as so read:

And the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, I wish to say a few words in regard to this matter. The population is an Indian population. Of the 35,000 people in that Territory, according to the census of 1880, all except four hundred and thirty were Indians. The President has no discretion as to the introduction of intoxicating liquors into any Indian country anywhere. No matter how many white people may be there, the law absolutely prohibits the introduction of intoxicating liquors; and it seems to me that we can not do any less for this Indian population than we have assumed to do for the other Indian populations of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say that there is no question that the evils of the traffic in intoxicating liquors have been more conspicuous in Alaska than perhaps among any other Indian tribes. I believe those tribes have inherited by tradition or received from Russia the knowledge of a process by means of which they manufacture a very vile and intoxicating form of liquor. There have been several instances where the lives and property of residents at the mission stations were put in great peril by intoxication resulting from the use of those liquors. For one I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I think perhaps it would be better to insert, after the word "the," in line 7, the words "provisions and," so as to carry the provisions and penalties of section 1955. I therefore move to insert those words, so as to read:

Under the provisions and penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. On the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], I ask permission to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the section is safer as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This concludes the amendments reported by the Committee on Territories to the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. It has been suggested to me by some of those who are familiar with the administration of the mining laws, which it was the intention of the committee to extend to the Territory by the bill, that the provisions of the bill are inadequate upon that subject, as no surveyor-general for the Territory is provided. I have prepared an amendment which in my judgment meets that objection. I move to insert, after the word "aforesaid," in line 17 of section 8, the following:

The Secretary of the Interior shall appoint suitable persons to make surveys of mining claims; and the commissioners provided for by this act shall discharge the duties now required by law of registers and receivers of public lands in relation to such claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be better to have them appointed by the President? It is a very extensive jurisdiction.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Vermont suggests to me that if these powers are conferred upon the commissioners, as proposed by the amendment, they should be appointed by the President of the United States. The commissioners are to be land officers. The amendment constitutes them ex officio registers and receivers. Under section 2334 of the Revised Statutes it is now provided that the surveyor-general of a Territory may appoint persons to make surveys, the fees for the surveys being paid by the parties for whom the service is rendered. My amendment provides that the Secretary of the Interior, there being no surveyor-general, may designate those surveyors, and then it constitutes the commissioners named under this act ex officio registers and receivers of the land office, so that they may discharge those functions after the surveys have been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would modify it and have them appointed under the direction of the commissioners, so that there may not be two conflicting jurisdictions.

Mr. HARRISON. These are the identical commissioners the Senator from Vermont will understand. I propose to make the four commissioners ex officio registers and receivers of public moneys. The bill provides that those commissioners shall be appointed by the President. The surveyors are not commissioners; they are private surveyors, designated and appointed by the Secretary of the Interior simply to make surveys, which are paid for by the persons for whom the service is rendered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is satisfactory on the whole

Mr. HARRISON. I propose, therefore, the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BOWEN. I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, to cover the same ground, but in a different way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed before the first word in section 8 to insert:

The said district of Alaska is hereby created a land district, and a United States land office for said district is hereby located at Sitka. The commissioner provided for by this act to reside at Sitka shall be ex officio register of said land office, and the clerk provided for by this act shall be ex officio receiver of public moneys. All orders for the survey of mining claims shall be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall likewise appoint one deputy mineral surveyor for said district, who shall hold his office until removed by said Secretary; and all plats and field-notes of surveys of mining claims shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, who shall, if he approve the same, certify to the fact in the same manner as is done by surveyors-general in districts or Territories having surveyors-general; and he shall likewise certify the amount expended in money or labor on each claim the plats and field-notes of the survey of which he approves, and shall transmit three certified copies of such plats and field-notes, together with one certificate of labor and improvements, to the register of said land office, who shall file and preserve in his office one copy of such plat and one copy of such field-notes, and shall deliver in each case the remaining copies of such plats and field-notes to the claimant of the mining claim, who may proceed to apply for and obtain patent from the Government of the United States in the same manner and with like effect as if such survey had been ordered and the plats and field-notes thereof had been approved, and the certificate of labor and improvements made by a surveyor-general; and.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, if I can get the attention of the Senator from Indiana and of the members of the committee for a few moments I think I can explain my amendment to the satisfaction of those Senators.

Section 8 of the bill proposes to extend the mining laws of the United States to the district of Alaska, which is created by this act. That is right, and I am very much in favor of it, because I know from information derived from several Senators on this floor familiar with the subject that Alaska comprises one of the best mining Territories belonging to the United States. It is a fact not generally known, but it is nevertheless true, that in Siberia, just beyond that country, the annual product of gold from the mines is between $24,000,000 and $26,000,000 each year, and the methods of reducing their ores are very crude indeed.

The mere act of extending the mining laws of the United States to the Territory of Alaska will be of no earthly importance unless we furnish the machinery by which those laws can be carried into execution. The first thing that it is necessary to do is to get a title to a mining claim, a thing very much to be desired, because as a rule in all new mining countries when a person discovers a good mine it results either in a lawsuit or in a small war, usually the latter. It is very desirable, therefore, that a person who finds a mining claim in a Territory over which the mining laws of the United States have been extended should be furnished the machinery with which to make good his title.

The first thing to be done to procure a title to a mining claim is to get an order of survey from the surveyor-general of the Territory. Not one single step can be taken toward procuring a title until that order is received from the surveyor-general. In this measure by which there is an attempt to make a skeleton government, which is all right enough, there has been no provision inserted for a surveyor-general. Therefore, unless there is some one who can discharge his duties in the one regard which I have just presented, of course the claimant to a mining claim can not take the first step toward getting a patent for his property. After the order is issued by the surveyor-general it is transmitted to the deputy mineral surveyor, who makes the survey. After he has made the survey he makes out a copy of the plat and field-notes and forwards it to the surveyor-general of the Territory. If there is no surveyor-general, that can not be done.

All of the details I shall not attempt to enumerate, having enumerated enough to show the Senate that it is necessary to have some provision in this regard, because when a man attempts to procure a title under the statutes he must be able to pursue that title, he must have some mode and manner pointed out very clearly by which he can pursue the statute, or he will have no title.

My amendment proposes to let the Secretary of the Interior do the acts which a surveyor general in that Territory might do if there were one. There is no provision for one, and I am not inclined to offer such an amendment, because the theory of the committee has been to make this a skeleton government. If the Senate will adopt my substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana there will be one officer who can do all the acts which are done under the law and the regulations of the Department by the surveyor-general.

The amendment of the Senator from Indiana, I submit, is not adequate to this emergency. It simply provides for the appointment of a surveyor to survey. There can be no survey until the claimant can get an order to survey. Nobody is provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to approve the plat and field-notes. Unless the survey is ordered in a regular way, unless the plat and field-notes are approved by a surveyor-general or by some competent authority which does not exist now, unless we give this authority to the Secretary of the Interior, the party who owns a mining claim can not even apply for a patent, he cannot get an order to publish his notice to the world in a newspaper.

Therefore, I say the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is wholly inadequate to meet the emergency of this case, and I believe upon consideration the committee will accept the amendment offered by me. I could explain the matter more fully, but I have mentioned just enough to show that there is no machinery furnished by this bill to carry into effect the mining law and extend it to the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado be read again for information.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HARRISON. I noticed the remarks of the Senator from Colorado as to the methods under the law of procuring title to a mining claim. I understand that the officers whose functions are called into exercise in getting such a title are, first, the surveyor-general of the Territory, who is called upon either to make, by himself or deputy, or by some surveyor appointed by him, a survey of the claim. The next officers, I suppose, are the receivers and registers of the land office, and the third, the confirming power upon their acts, is the Secretary of the Interior.

In the amendment which I have proposed I have conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior the power that is given by section 2334 of the Revised Statutes to the surveyor-general to designate the persons upon applications to survey the claims. That section provides just how it shall be done, just what notice shall be given, and how the fees shall be paid by the persons for whom the service is done. Under my amendment an application is made to the Secretary of the Interior; and he designates a surveyor to survey the claim. These commissioners are constituted registers and receivers of the land office, and may discharge all the functions that would be discharged by those officers if they were constituted as such and no other functions given to them. The case comes then to the Secretary of the Interior precisely as it would do if there was a surveyor-general and a register and receiver in the Territory.

When the general laws of the United States prescribe the methods for doing this thing I can not see why all the machinery which the Senator has incorporated in his amendment can be necessary. I do not like the phraseology of "land district" as the amendment stands, and believing that the amendment which I have proposed meets all of the requirements under the mining law, I am not inclined to adopt or accept or to favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BOWEN. I submit that the argument of the Senator from Indiana does not meet the points which I made in the remarks I submitted. I ask for the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert in section 8, line 17, after the word "aforesaid:"

> The Secretary of the Interior shall appoint suitable persons to make surveys of mining claims; and the commissioners provided for by this act shall discharge the duties now required by law of registers and receivers of public lands in relation to such claims.

Mr. BOWEN. The amendment, it will be seen, provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint the surveyor to make a survey of a mining claim. My amendment makes the same provision, but the Senator does not provide in his amendment for the procurement of the order by which the survey shall be made. His amendment, I submit, is wholly inadequate to meet the emergency of the case. You can not start the machinery unless some one is empowered to make the order, so that the amendment is utterly inadequate.

The amendment also provides that the commissioners shall act as registers and receivers of the land office. I should like to know which commissioners. A commissioner living in Sitka and a commissioner living at Wrangel cannot hold a land office; they cannot run around with the papers in their hats. There must be a land office established, and Alaska must be declared a land district. If you are going to extend the mining laws to that Territory you must create a land district. If you do not intend to do that, then do not attempt to do it. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is utterly inadequate to meet the emergencies of this case. You will have no land office, nobody to order the survey, and nobody to approve the survey. The purport and extent of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is simply to appoint deputy mineral surveyors to make the surveys. How are they going to make the surveys? Who will order them to make the surveys? Until such time as they get the orders, and the surveys are made, and the plats are furnished and approved, there can be no application under the mining laws for a patent.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that if there is anything in his point that under my amendment the Secretary of the Interior would not have authority to order a survey, he can simply put those words in the amendment. After the power conferred by it on the Secretary of the Interior to appoint surveyors he can insert the words "and to order surveys of mineral claims."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana so modify his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to make that modification to meet the views of the Senator from Colorado. Let the words "and to order the survey of mineral claims" be inserted after the words "mining claims" in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be so modified.

Mr. HARRISON. The commissioners will have defined districts. It is made the duty of the judge to define the districts over which their jurisdiction extends. The sole objection, so far as I can see, is that the functions of receiver and register are committed to the same man. I know that that is anomalous, like everything else in the bill; we are trying to avoid too much machinery; but I can not but believe that it will be just as efficient as all the machinery that is provided for in detail in the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BOWEN. We have now one concession. The Senator proposes to amend his amendment by allowing the Secretary of the Interior to make the order for the surveys. Two of the points covered by my amendment have been conceded. Now, there is one more point: Who shall approve the surveys? I should like very much to have the Senator explain how a land office can be run by a commissioner. How are you going to make the register of a land office a receiver of public moneys? I can very readily see how the commissioner to be appointed under this act residing at Sitka could be ex officio register of the land office; I can readily understand how the clerk to be appointed under this act could be receiver of public moneys; but how are you going to let the commissioners act as a land office? Alaska is 1,500 miles long and 2,000 miles wide, and I do not see how you are going to do the business. These things can not be carried around in people's hats. As perfect a record of all the proceedings from beginning to end will have to be kept in these cases as in any case you can imagine, from the simple fact that it is the case of a man attempting to get a title to a piece of land under a statute. Every lawyer knows that when you attempt to get a title under a statute, the provisions of the statute must be followed strictly and absolutely and literally; nothing is taken by implication.

I submit to the Senator from Indiana that my amendment covers the very suggestion that he has now proposed to put in his amendment, and that it covers the whole case. What objection can there be to naming the commissioner at Sitka to be ex officio register of the land office? What objection can there be to designating the clerk to be appointed under this act as the man to be the receiver of public moneys? Then you virtually have a United States land office at Sitka; you have no additional officers besides those provided by the bill as reported from the Committee on Territories, and you have all the machinery to carry out what is intended to be done under the mining laws.

I say without this amendment you will run against obstacles which you can not overcome. You will not get to the fourth step in your attempt to get a title to these lands until you find yourself in a place where you can proceed no further legally. I undertake to say that you can not proceed to get a title under a statute unless you pursue the statute, and you can not pursue a statute which is vacant, so to speak, as to important and material details which go to the essence of the title itself.

I think the amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado does not go any too far, and that if we are to provide for the adjustment of rights on the mineral lands of Alaska we ought to have at least as much machinery and as much authority as is given in that amendment. If there is no way of making authentic surveys of the claims, of practically deciding between contesting claims for the same piece of property, there will be trouble there, and trouble liable to be of the most serious kind, which will go far toward preventing the accomplishment of the object which we have in view in this bill. Unless there is security of title there can be no social order. There is no form of property about which such serious contests arise, and contests which are so liable to lead to bloodshed, as mining claims.

After listening to the second reading of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, I think it is admirably designed to accomplish the object which the Senator from Indiana has in view, and which I think should be the object also of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not see why the detail that is provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Colorado in reference to the manner of securing title to a mining claim is necessary unless the present statutes of the United States are wholly inadequate on the subject. When we have a surveyor-general practically (for those duties are confided by the bill to the Secretary of the Interior, and it authorizes him to do what that officer does), and when we have a register and receiver of the land office, have we not all the machinery provided now by law for settling mining claims? For one, I wish, in the simplest and safest way we can, to put in a provision here that will allow proper surveys and proper records and the securing of proper and safe titles to mining claims in that Territory. If I did not believe that the amendment which I have proposed is ample to that end I would consent to something else; but it seems to me that it is.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that by his amendment he makes the Secretary of the Interior the surveyor-general of Alaska. The Secretary of the Interior is a long way from that Territory; it will take a month to communicate with him. Suppose a man has found a mining lode. He makes application for an order for a survey under the mining law. According to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, to comply with the land laws, and to get that order from the Secretary of the Interior, the order will have to go back before it can be applied, and that would occupy not less than two months; and if the claimant should be unfortunate about reaching the first steamer it would take three months. In the mean time a great deal of confusion, jumping of claims, perhaps fighting, would take place, and the party who first discovered the lode might be deprived of his possession.

A mining claim, if worth anything at all, is worth a great deal. There is no other kind of property in regard to the title of which there should be so much care taken in the law. We want to make it so that the title can be procured speedily and perfectly, and that there may be no loop-hole, no difficulty, no chance for litigation. The vice of our whole mining region is the litigation over mining claims. That leads to more trouble and confusion in the mining regions than all else. Nearly all the personal conflicts and difficulties in new regions come from that source.

I really think the amendment of the Senator from Colorado meets the case exactly, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. HARRISON. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from California, I wish to make a suggestion to him. There is force in his statement that the Secretary of the Interior, who is to order the surveys, is very remote from the place where they are to be made. Would it not, then, meet all the requirements if the amendment should be put in this shape:

The marshals provided for by this act shall be ex officio surveyors-general of said district, and the commissioners provided for herein shall be ex officio registers and receivers of the land office within their several districts.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If you establish a land office there must be land districts.

Mr. HARRISON. The commissioners are located. They are not land districts, but their districts are to be designated by the judge, and they are to be assigned by districts.

Mr. HOAR. Each of them is to be a land officer?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, each one is to be a register and receiver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana propose to modify his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; I do not; I was simply making a suggestion.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The land district must be defined by law in order to have a register and receiver.

Mr. HARRISON. I say to the Senator from California that the districts of these commissioners are defined by law, or are at least to be defined under law, because the bill provides that the district judge shall define the districts of the commissioners. The amendment which is offered by the Senator from Colorado may be without objection; I am willing that the Senate shall vote upon it; but it seemed to me that the amendment which I moved was sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] in lieu of that proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Mr. President, I suppose the object of giving to Alaska a civil government is to promote order there; it is to protect life and property. It is a fact that if any disorder shall arise there it will be by reason of a conflict over titles to mining grounds. Nine-tenths of the white population of Alaska are miners, bold prospectors, who have gone to that distant country in search of lodes of the precious metals.

I for one would have preferred that this bill should have followed the usual course, and have provided all the machinery which is provided for other Territories in the United States for the survey of mining titles, and have prescribed the methods and means of getting titles to mining grounds. That system has been long in vogue, and has proved not only the most efficient but the most economical. I have noticed that all legislation devolving the duties of one office upon another officer has proved not only expensive but inefficient, and has lacked celerity and precision, and done nothing but bring about confusion.

Although Alaska was charged yesterday with being the poorest country on the face of the earth and its purchase by the United States as one of the worst bargains ever made, it must be remembered that Alaska has already paid into the Treasury of the United States about $4,000,000 out of the $7,000,000 that it originally cost, and there are left to-day more fur-seal upon the Aleutian Islands than were there when the Territory was acquired by the United States. That source of revenue is not likely ever to be cut off if the United States shall wisely protect that industry and that enterprise as it has done heretofore. Why should there be any little cheese-paring business in setting up rules and regulations for governing a most important industry?

I have a case in mind of a dispute that has arisen there within the last year. Nearly three years ago a company formed in San Francisco entered upon mining ground on Douglas Island, one hundred miles north of Sitka. They discovered a quartz ledge whose proportions I think have never been seen in the United States. If the precious metals shall continue in depth on that lode as rich as they appear on the surface, it will be the greatest gold mine that ever was discovered on the face of the earth. After having erected a quartz-mill upon that ground, conducted water to it in iron pipes at great expense, and fitted out a ship to go there, prospectors from British Columbia went over there and made the excuse that the pulverized material on top of the lode, the decomposed quartz that was found there, made a placer mine, and they immediately passed resolutions in a town meeting that placer mining was more sacred than quartz mining; they took possession of the property, and according to the best of my information they have washed off about $180,000.

The first discoverers, the owners, those who had put a great deal of money in the enterprise, sat by, and there was no law to appeal to, no method of asserting or defending their rights except by violence and force. A short time after this invasion of their rights had taken place, a revenue-cutter steamed in and anchored close to the disputed possession, but the captain of the revenue-cutter had no judicial functions, and he simply declared that he would maintain the statu quo. The statu quo was that those people were in possession, and nothing could be done; and I believe that is the condition it is in to-day. On that island, with a quartz lode measuring between five and six hundred feet in width, a lode almost unprecedented in its extent and wealth and running from ten miles on the island, the ownership all along its line is subject to what are called "jumpers," people who without a shadow of title or law have passed resolutions in a town meeting that the property is theirs. The property promises to be one of very great value; and on the mainland, two or three miles from the shore, perhaps five miles from the island where this lode occurs, there is another great lode half a mile wide and some three or four miles long, upon which there are hundreds of locators.

It seems to me that in order to give civil government to Alaska, in order to give protection to this main business of that Territory—for there is no other being prosecuted there—the people should be protected by all the safeguards, by all the laws, and by all the precision given to any other Territory of the United States. What is the effect? If the land laws are not extended there and no man can acquire a title to land, and if you do not extend the machinery for perfecting title to mining claims, and if those who go there to establish fisheries can not get title to enough land to build their canneries upon, what is there for anybody to stay there for and what is this law about? There is nothing. What are your judges for? What are they to decide on? Nobody has any property; nobody owns a foot of land; no one has a title to anything; and yet we are here providing a magnificent government, with a governor, judges, commissioners, justices of the peace, &c., to decide about what?

Sir, I only have to repeat that nine-tenths of the white men who are there are there for the business of mining, and they are very liable to find in Alaska the greatest mines ever discovered in the United States. In proportion to their richness will be the disputes about them. For my part, I would much rather see that Territory organized with a surveyor-general, with a register and receiver, and all the safeguards that have been thrown about the prospectors in all the Territories of the United States heretofore.

If we can do no better I should prefer the amendment of the Senator from Colorado; but better than that, wiser than that, in my opinion, in order that the surveys there may conform to the surveys elsewhere in the United States, and in order to act in consonance with the dignity and wealth of this country, in making provision for that Territory we should not adopt a line of departure from the provisions made heretofore for all the other Territories of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND. This feature of the bill that we are now on is a very important matter. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is one that goes considerably into detail on this particular subject of surveys, and it ought to be examined, I think, very carefully. It can not very well be examined in manuscript at this particular time, and I should like for this matter to go over in order that the amendments may be printed. The Supreme Court has intimated several times in several very important cases in reference to surveys of mining lands generally very grave difficulties in dealing with that subject. In a quite recent case that came from California they made several suggestions which might very well be covered by any amendment that comes in now. I ask that this matter may go over and that the amendments may be printed so that we may have them before the Senate to-morrow, and then I will move an executive session. There is some executive business, I understand, that it is necessary to transact.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to offer an amendment that it may go over with the rest, to come in after the word "judge," in line 31 of section 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill in order that it may be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. I make the suggestion that all amendments so far as Senators have offered them be printed.

Mr. BOWEN. If that is to be the order I have several amendments to offer to other sections of the bill, and if amendments are to be printed I will offer them in omnibus.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My amendment is to be added to section 5 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BOWEN. I offer the amendments which I send to the Chair, to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CULLOM. Do I understand that the proposition is that this order shall close out any further amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By no means.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to offer an amendment that it may be printed. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado should be adopted, I should want the amendment I now offer to come at the end of section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. LOGAN. While the doors are being closed, as I believe authority was given this morning to make a minority report on the bill (S. 158) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, I ask now the privilege of submitting the views of the minority upon that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the report at this time? The Chair hears none, and the views of the minority will be received and printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RESOLUTION OF THANKS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer for immediate consideration a joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 120) giving the thanks of Congress to the men who rescued the survivors of the wrecked steamer City of Columbus.

Resolved, &c., That the thanks of Congress are given to Capt. Eric Gabrielson, commanding the United States steamer Dexter, and the officers and men under his command, and to the men who manned the life-boats from the shore, for their brave and humane conduct in saving the survivors of the wrecked steamer City of Columbus, in Vineyard Sound, off Gay Head, in Massachusetts, on the 18th of January, 1884; especially to Lieut. John U. Rhodes, who, at the imminent peril of his life, twice swam to the steamer through the heavy seas and floating wreckage and rescued the two men who were clinging to the rigging.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 120) was read a second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONG moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask now unanimous consent to present a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be allowed a messenger at an annual salary not to exceed the sum of $1,440.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution for reference?

There was no objection.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

JACOB BOGERT.

Mr. VALENTINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3938) for the relief of Jacob Bogert; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Accounts I am instructed to submit the following report, and recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution, and also to ask its present consideration by the House.

The SPEAKER. The report and resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. —) giving one month's pay to certain employés of the House of Representatives, with instructions to inquire and report to the House whether there were persons turned out of their positions at the close of the last session of Congress and others put in their places who have performed no service, are of opinion that it is desirable that the House should be in possession of all the facts and circumstances connected with such removals or resignations, and to that end report the following resolution and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts or any subcommittee thereof be and are authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and that the chairman of said committee or of any subcommittee thereof be empowered to administer oaths to any person or persons who shall appear before said committee or its subcommittee to testify to any matter under investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask if this requires an appropriation or provides for it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, although the Chair did not observe closely the reading of the report.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that it be reported again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. REED. Does not this necessarily involve an expenditure?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question. It is a question that each member must determine for himself.

Mr. REED. Does it not involve an expenditure within the purview of the rule?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for its immediate consideration. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMEDIATE APPROPRIATIONS FOR CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations I am directed to report the following joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read by its title a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read at length, after which the Chair will ask for objections to its present consideration.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available, to be applied to the support and maintenance of the Indians at Crow agency, at Fort Belknap, Fort Peck, and Blackfeet agencies, in Montana Territory.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution may now be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the report just made may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole at the present time. Is there objection?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope there will be some explanation of the resolution.

Mr. ELLIS. I propose to give an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this report by the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIS. A deficiency, Mr. Speaker, is reported to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of the Interior; and by his report, as also by the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, based upon the reports of the Indian agents at these various places, and also of the Indian inspectors, it appears that these Indians are in a most deplorable and destitute condition, being absolutely in a state of starvation.

On the 16th day of November, for instance, the appropriation for their support had run so low that their rations were as follows: They were receiving at that date per week about one and a half pounds of beef and 2.42 pounds of flour, or one-fifth of a pound of beef and one-third of a pound of flour per day. The result was that the weak ones, the little ones, and the sick ones were actually dying of starvation and destitution.

For the first time in their history the buffalo have disappeared from the hunting grounds. There is no longer any of the game, upon which these Indians formerly subsisted, on their hunting-grounds. Their crops, owing to the drought and the frost, and owing to their being placed in a country and on soil that absolutely needs irrigation for purposes of agriculture, have utterly failed, and the result is their utter destitution.

There are 15,000 of these Indians at the four reservations named in the resolution. And we may soon expect to hear, if we do not act promptly, that these people have gone upon the war-path; and then, in addition to the reflection that we have not discharged our duty, we will have the comforting fact of an Indian war on our hands and the large expense of an Indian war as the penalty of our parsimony and niggardliness in this matter. If gentlemen desire further information, I am prepared to give it.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be glad if the gentleman from Louisiana would tell us what the amount appropriated last year was and how this deficiency comes at so early a period.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is this appropriation asked for by the Department?

Mr. ELLIS. It is asked for by the Interior Department.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I sincerely hope, as an act of humanity, this resolution will be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] has not yielded the floor.

Mr. ELLIS. In reply to the gentleman from Texas, I will state that in 1880, when there was plenty of game on the hunting-grounds of these people, we gave them 800,000 pounds of beef. In 1881, when there was also game, we gave them 632,000 pounds. In 1883 we gave them some 400,000 pounds. But this year, when there is no game at all and when the crops have entirely failed, we have given them but about 300,000 pounds of beef. The appropriation for the current year is within $5,000 of the appropriation for last year. But for some cause which is not explained, either the high price of beef, the scarcity of provisions, or something of that kind, the amount has not been found to be sufficient.

Mr. REAGAN. It appears from the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] that the appropriation for the present year is within $5,000 of the appropriation for last year, and the deficiency occurs, it seems, when only half the year has expired. There is something in the statement made, it appears to me, which might very well arrest the attention of the House in connection with this Indian policy. Here we speak of issuing rations of meat and bread regularly to a number of Indians—will the gentleman from Louisiana state how many?

Mr. ELLIS. Fifteen thousand.

Mr. REAGAN. We have here the statement that regular rations of bread and meat are issued, besides, of course, blankets, clothing, appropriations for schools, for agricultural implements, workshops, tools, &c. Now, sir, it has all the time seemed to me that there ought to be some limitation placed upon the appropriations of Congress for this purpose.

I would not have any one think that I was influenced by any want of humanity or by any want of a sense of justice. But, sir, why is it? Here are about 15,000 Indians. Altogether there are some 300,000 Indians in the country, and we are supporting the most of them out of the public Treasury and by the labor of men as poor as they are. Why is it? You can pick out 300,000 white people as poor as these Indians are, white people who need help as much as these Indians, who are as little able to work for a living as these Indians are. But we appropriate no six or seven or eight millions of dollars for their relief. Why is it?

I heard a very distinguished gentleman, who occupied a position in the other end of the Capitol, say once that our policy of teaching the Indians to read and write as a means of civilization was all wrong; "for," said he, "when you teach the Indian to read and write you unfit him to be either an Indian or a white man. If you will commence at the basis of all civilization, and teach him patient labor and industry, teach him to support himself as other people have to support themselves, then you may add to that profitably instruction in learning at the schools. But, sir, to take up the wild savages, teach them eternal idleness, teach them to continue to despise labor by which all men are instructed that they shall earn their living, it seems to me that is a policy which is all wrong."

I think that the committee having charge of Indian affairs ought to show to this House why it is that we are called upon from year to year to spend from six to eight millions of dollars in carrying out the policy of feeding lazy vagabond Indians who ought to be made to go to work for their own support. Why should we do that? Who has a right to call upon me or upon my neighbors and constituents to contribute from the fruit of our labors to feed a parcel of idle, lazy vagabonds who will not work?

Now, if the Government will adopt a policy which will teach these Indians to work for a living I shall have no objection. But when it teaches them that they should live off of the fruits of the labor of other people while themselves in idleness, that is wrong to the people of the United States and to the Indians themselves.

It was said by a distinguished citizen of New York that as a matter of economy the Government could afford to board these Indians at the Fifth Avenue Hotel at $5 a day each, and the bill would not be near as great as the expense now of supporting these Indians in idleness and maintaining a horde of thieving Indian agents. It is time, I think, that some reform should take place in this matter.

I call attention to what appears here, that at the expiration of one-half of the fiscal year there comes in here a deficiency of $50,000 for the support of 15,000 of these Indians. There will have to be a very strong case made out before I will consent to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. ELLIS. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. In the confusion prevailing here I was not able to hear all that was said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in opposition to this appropriation. But as nearly as I could understand him he is opposed to making this appropriation in midwinter because he would first begin the work of reform in the matter of training and taking care of these Indians.

I wish things were different in regard to these Indian tribes, but in the centuries that we have been acquainted with them we have failed to bring about that desirable state of affairs which the gentleman from Texas now thinks should be brought about before we appropriate any money for these starving Indians whom we have undertaken to provide for by furnishing them suitable supplies.

The United States has entered upon a well-defined policy, whether wise or not need not be discussed in the consideration of this appropriation. The fact is made clearly to appear to the Indian Department and to the Government that for want of the supplies which were solemnly promised to them by sacred treaty stipulations these Indians are now actually starving to death, that they are carrying their little children from their huts, if you can call them such, and laying them away in outhouses actually to die, while we are hesitating here whether or not we shall carry out the sacred obligations of the Government of the United States towards them. I do not think we will stop to enter upon a discussion of any great length in reference to a new policy before we at least try to do our duty toward these people.

I want to state one thing to the House, that members may understand how we have acted toward these Indians. A few weeks ago, when upon the Crow Indian reservation, I was told that the United States Government obtained from the Indians the right to sell to the Northern Pacific Railroad the right of way through and a certain portion of the lands of the Indian reservation. The United States, having obtained this right, sold it to the Northern Pacific Railroad, with the understanding that the money obtained therefor was to go to the Crow Indians. The Government obtained $25,000 of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for that right, and then quietly and neatly put the money into the Treasury, and up to the present hour has never made a single motion toward paying it over to these Crow Indians who are starving out there to-day. And we are considering here now whether or not we will send them money or supplies to support them. That is the way we act toward these Indians. We persuaded those on this reservation to give the United States authority to sell a portion of their reservation and a right of way through it to a railroad company, and when we have made that sale we take the money and keep it, and have it yet.

I think a very proper reply was made on the part of the chiefs of the Indians on this Crow reservation when distinguished Senators of the United States went out there last summer to treat with them concerning ceding a portion of their reservation. The chiefs folded their arms and said that they would consult with no person upon the subject of selling any portion of their reservation until they obtained from the United States the money for the portion which they had consented already should be sold and had been sold. They took that position, and I hope they will always stand on it, until the Government of the United States through Congress shall deal justly and fairly with these people.

I wish things were as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says they ought to be, but they are not. Because these people are feeble, because they are far away from us, because they are powerless even when they go to war, we at least ought to be careful in our dealings with them to keep faith with them and to carry out our treaty stipulations honestly and faithfully. I hope there will be no vote given against this appropriation.

Mr. ELLIS. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROBINSON] for five minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I sincerely trust this appropriation will be made, and that there will be not a single dissenting vote against it. It was my fortune last summer to spend some time on this reservation. I was there when that disastrous frost came which destroyed all the vegetation in that section of country. It is absolutely true, Mr. Speaker, that those people to-day are destitute. There is no game left upon the reservation. The annuities to those tribes amount to $14 per head. A thousand head of cattle purchased in Iowa by the agent for the Crow Indians last year are now absolutely starving upon that reservation. It is an act of justice that this Congress should make this appropriation, and make it at once. The same kind of suffering exists among all those tribes in that northern latitude, owing to the severity of the winter and the short crops of last season.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman state what Indians these are, and where they are situated?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. They are the Crow Indians, situated in Montana.

A MEMBER. And the Blackfeet Indians.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. And the Blackfeet Indians, and I presume the Ute Indians.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read a third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the joint resolution, there were—ayes 128, noes 28.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENTS ON HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Congress at its last session appropriated the sum of $78,035.96, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of straightening, walling up with stone, and otherwise improving Hot Springs Creek along its course through the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, the said amount so appropriated having arisen from rents collected on property situated upon said reservation and sale of lands thereon; and

Whereas said work was commenced and prosecuted until the 15th day of the present month, when the appropriation became exhausted, leaving one-half of the work unfinished, and that already constructed, together with all the plant and appliances, in a condition to be greatly injured; and

Whereas it should be completed as early as possible, and can not be prosecuted during the summer months without endangering the health of those employed in its construction and that of visitors to and citizens of the town of Hot Springs: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be instructed to ascertain the present condition of the work, the amount expended in its prosecution up to the time of its suspension, how much will be required to complete it, and whether or not the public interest demands that the additional sum necessary to complete the work should be appropriated and made available before the regular appropriations take effect, and report the result of such inquiry to the House by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not rise to make objection, but to suggest that, as a question has been raised whether the money already appropriated for this purpose has been wisely expended and doubts have been thrown on the integrity of some of the expenditures, it seems to me this inquiry should be made broad enough to ascertain whether there has been any improper expenditure of the money already appropriated.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. That is one of the objects of the resolution—that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department may investigate that matter and furnish to the Appropriations Committee such data and statistics as will enable them to act intelligently when they come to act on this subject. If it be thought desirable to add an amendment of that kind to the resolution, I have no sort of objection, though I think the resolution in its present form embraces that subject-matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it does I have no objection to the resolution; but I think it does not.

Mr. CASSIDY. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow a question?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CASSIDY. Does this resolution call for information as to why there was a change in the plan of this improvement?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. On a former day of the present session I introduced a resolution calling for that specific information. That resolution was adopted, and will be answered to-day, as I understand, by furnishing the original contracts and all the modifications, with any suggestions upon the subject that the Secretary of the Interior may desire to make to the House.

That communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. This resolution covers the whole of the remaining ground.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose that the resolution be amended by inserting——

The SPEAKER. The first question is whether there is unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the resolution amended by inserting near the close of it, after the words "take effect," the words "whether any part of the moneys appropriated have been improperly expended."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have no objection to accepting that amendment as a modification of the resolution.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLOWANCE TO UNION SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to present at this time the resolution and petition which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. This seems to be a resolution adopted by some post; it is not a subject of legislation.

Mr. WELLER. My desire, Mr. Speaker, is simply to have this resolution reported and put upon the record, in accordance with the request of soldiers of the late war. They desire to have this done in their interest. Papers of this character are coming to me by the hundred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not state at first what he desired. As the Chair now understands, he asks unanimous consent to present these resolutions, that they may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You do not want the names printed.

Mr. WELLER. No, sir.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution, as follows:

Preamble and resolutions of J. V. Carpenter Post, 104, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, that all soldiers and sailors who served during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion and were honorably discharged shall receive $8 a month in lieu of any less allowance.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Resolutions of this character are coming in, I suppose, to every member of the House; and if they were all printed in the RECORD we should have a voluminous RECORD. It seems to me that the proper place for them is the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. The soldiers of the country desire to be heard. There is this way they can be heard by having these resolutions printed in the RECORD. It is a poor boon that they ask. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection and not slap the soldiers in the face.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is all buncombe. [Laughter.] There are hundreds of these resolutions. I have a great many myself, as I presume they are sent to all the other members of the House, and if it were desired to print a single resolution I should not object, but to print in the RECORD all such resolutions as they come in would unnecessarily lumber it up, and would do no good.

Mr. WELLER. I only ask that this resolution be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They will all reach the proper committee in the ordinary way.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House, and further debate is not in order.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of the Presbyterian General Assembly of the United States asking for a government for Alaska and to provide for schools, and that it be printed in the ROCORD.

Mr. RANDALL. Without knowing what this is it had better be objected to.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the title be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to object, but all these things should take the regular course.

KANSAS RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, there was granted to the State of Kansas for the purpose of aiding in the construction—

First. Of a railroad and telegraph from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence, and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, to the southern line of the State in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River, to the point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad where said road intersects the Neosho River.

Second. Of a railroad from the city of Atchison, via Topeka, the capital of said State, to the western line of the State, in the direction of Fort Union and Santa Fé, N. Mex., with a branch from the point where this last-named road crosses the Neosho, down said Neosho Valley to the point where the said first-named road enters the said Neosho Valley, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said roads and each of its branches; and

Whereas it was provided by said act as follows: "That if any part of said roads and branches is not completed within ten years from the passage of this act, no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States;" and

Whereas it is alleged that the whole of said roads and branches were not completed within ten years from the passage of said act, to wit, that the road from the city of Leavenworth to the town of Lawrence, the branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River, to the Neosho, and the branch from where the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road crosses the Neosho, down said Neosho Valley to the point where the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston road enters said valley, have never been constructed; and

Whereas it is alleged that the Secretary of the Interior, on or about October 6, 1883, certified to the State of Kansas a list of about 189,384 acres for the benefit of the said Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to immediately inform the House of Representatives whether or not the roads and branches above mentioned were completed within ten years from the passage of said act; and if not so completed by what authority or under what law the list of lands above specified was certified to said State as aforesaid.

PUBLIC BUILDING, HELENA, ARK.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3939) for the erection of a public building at Helena, Ark.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I was prevented by an accident on the railroad from being present in time to vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in reference to the public lands. I telegraphed to my colleague [Mr. SNYDER] to procure me a pair, but he found it impossible to do so. I wish to state now that if I had been present, I would have voted in favor of that resolution.

HEAD OF NAVIGATION, MINNESOTA RIVER.

Mr. WAKEFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 122) fixing the head of navigation of the Minnesota River, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CAMPAIGNS OF MAJOR-GENERAL BUELL.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of the proceedings and finding of the commission appointed to investigate the campaigns of Maj. Don Carlos Buell in 1862 be printed for the use of the members of this House.

MARY M. BLECKEN.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3940) for the relief of Mary M. Blecken; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3941) authorizing the refunding of duties paid on six statues from Munich, Bavaria, by St. John's University, of Collegeville, Minn.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. SARAH E. B. SMITH.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3942) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah E. B. Smith; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE MAXWELL.

Mr. PERKINS (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3943) for the relief of George Maxwell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADAM STUBER.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3944) granting a pension to Adam Stuber; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A. L. DICKERMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3945) for the relief of A. L. Dickerman and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPRINTING REPORT OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back a joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read; after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. —) authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the report of the Chief Signal Officer, submit the following report:

That the estimated cost of printing the 5,000 additional copies of the report in question is $8,825. The joint resolution received the indorsement of the Committee on Printing in the Forty-seventh Congress, but was reported too late for action by the House of Representatives. We recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 123) authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the report of the Chief Signal Officer.

The joint resolution was read by its title a first and second time.

It is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind, for the use of the Signal Office, 5,000 additional copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the year 1882; and the Public Printer is hereby authorized to contract for the illustrations with the person now furnishing the illustrations for the Congressional edition.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that privileged?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to make the report for present consideration. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. I would like to have some explanation of this matter.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. The report gives the explanation, and I ask the Clerk to read the executive document which accompanies the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, dated the 8th instant, inclosing one from Capt. S. M. Mills, Fifth Artillery, indorsed by the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, recommending that Congress authorize the printing and binding, for the use of the Signal Office, of 5,000 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year 1882, and inclosing a draught of a joint resolution for the purpose.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 13, 1883.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 8, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, with request for their transmission to Congress, a letter of the 26th ultimo from Capt. S. M. Mills, Fifth Artillery, bearing an indorsement of approval by the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, recommending that Congress authorize the printing and binding, for the use of the Signal Office, of 5,000 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882, together with a draught of a joint resolution for that purpose.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington, November 26, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that the honorable Secretary of War may cause Congress to be requested to authorize the printing and binding of 5,000 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Inclosed herewith please find duplicate copies of draught of resolution, that the Printing Committee of the House of Representatives and of the Senate may each be supplied with a copy, to enable simultaneous action to be taken by both.

A request was made December 22, 1882, for 10,000 copies of this report, and a joint resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives February 19, 1883, referred to the Committee on Printing, and died in committee; hence the necessity for this second request, which, however, is for one-half the number originally asked.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. M. MILLS,
Captain, Fifth United States Artillery,
Property and Disbursing Officer,
Signal Service, U. S. A., Acting Signal Officer.

The CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.

[Indorsement.]

SIGNAL OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 30, 1883.

Respectfully forwarded to the honorable the Secretary of War, approved.

W. B. HAZEN,
Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen., Chief Signal Officer, U. S. A.

Mr. REED. That does not give any reasons why this should be done, nor does it give any explanation as to the reasons which prompted the committee. It simply shows that some gentleman wants it to be done.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that some reason will be given by the gentleman from New York for this matter. We last year appropriated constantly for this and similar purposes, and in consultation with those persons who are acquainted with the facts it was ascertained that there was an amount of this fragmentary printing done during that Congress in excess of what was ever done before. I hope we will not enter upon that course during this Congress.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from New York will at least give us an explanation of it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I, like the gentleman from Maine, would wish to be informed as to the necessity for this printing. The report is by no means clear.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I only know, Mr. Speaker, that this request was submitted to the Committee on Printing by the War Department, and that the committee, having considered the matter, deemed that it was proper to grant the request, and have authorized me to make the report. As has been stated, this was reported favorably in the Forty-seventh Congress, at the heels of the session, but no action was taken upon it. It is reported here again for the action of the House. This printing is done for the use of the Chief Signal Officer, as he has expressed a wish to have it done, for distribution.

Mr. REED. I should think it would be wise for the gentleman from New York to withdraw the report until he is in a condition to furnish the House the information required. This expenditure may be entirely proper and a suitable thing to do, but I would like to have the information which I have asked upon the subject.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. The Committee on Printing, in their consideration of such matters, have adopted the rule not to report to the House favorably upon any matter without first ascertaining the cost. They report that this will cost a little over $8,000.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let me suggest to the gentleman reporting this measure that it would be better perhaps to permit it to remain in its present condition, or let it go over——

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, I think that would be proper, because if the libraries have been already furnished I hardly see any necessity for printing a new edition of a work now almost two years old.

Mr. RANDALL. I make that suggestion to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. What is it?

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. Individually I have no objection to that. I have thus far, however, only obeyed instructions from the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to referring the report and joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to this House such information as he may be able to communicate, at an early day, in regard to the trade between the United States and Mexico and to the traffic over railroads connecting the two countries.

INDIAN-DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. GEORGE. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am directed to report back, with the recommendation that it be adopted, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish this House with a list of all claims allowed in his Department for depredations committed by tribes of Indians who now have annuities or treaty or other funds due to them from the United States, with a statement of the names and addresses of the claimants and the amounts allowed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to inquire if there is a report accompanying the resolution. I understand the rule requires a written report on all measures reported by committees.

The SPEAKER. The rule so requires. The Chair is informed the report is here. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to have it read?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir; I only wished to know if there was a report.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution was not distinctly heard. I desire that it may be reported again.

The resolution was again read.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GEORGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMSON GOLIAH.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3946) for the relief of Samson Goliah; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH RAIBLE.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee. I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to object to the introduction of bills, but we have a day set apart for that purpose, and I must demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports. Before the call is proceeded with the Chair asks consent to submit certain executive communications.

There was no objection.

EXPENDITURES FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the House dated January 11, 1883, a letter, dated the 21st instant, from the Secretary of War, together with a report submitted to him by the Chief of Engineers embodying the information so far as the same can be furnished from the records of his office, and a statement prepared in the Treasury Department respecting the expenditures for rivers and harbors, called for by the said resolution.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 22, 1884.

IMPROVEMENT OF HOT SPRINGS CREEK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of the original contract and other papers touching the work of improving the Hot Springs Creek, in the town of Hot Springs, Ark.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS UNDER ACT OF JULY 4, 1864.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting one hundred and seventy-one claims arising under the act of July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement showing expenses incurred on account of coast and geodetic survey for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

E. J. PHILLIPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting papers filed in the claim of E. J. Phillips, postmaster at Oberlin, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

POST-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a communication from the postmaster of Washington, D. C., suggesting a new building for the post-office for Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CIVIL EMPLOYÉS IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of the civil employés of the Navy Department during the calendar year 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, JERRY'S POINT, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports relating to the improvement of the shoal in the channel of the harbor of refuge, near Jerry's Point, New Hampshire, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the leave of absence granted to Mr. BLACKBURN was extended indefinitely.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to withdraw the demand for the regular order to allow a report to be made from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withhold the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

DEFICIENCY, REBATE ON TOBACCO TAX, ETC.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF MISSOURI.

Mr. BROADHEAD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bills 877 and 2359, a bill (H. R. 3949) to amend an act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, and to prescribe the times and places of holding courts therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, placed upon the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MAP OF TRANSPORTATION ROUTES.

Mr. WOODWARD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 19) to authorize and require the preparation of a map showing all rail and water transportation routes in the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1457) to establish a department of agriculture; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, also reported adversely the following; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 508) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture;

A bill (H. R. 868) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture;

A bill (H. R. 871) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture;

A bill (H. R. 1224) to provide for the reorganization of the Department of Agriculture; and

A bill (H. R. 2218) to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture.

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with a favorable recommendation the following; which was placed upon the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 1323) fixing the rate of postage to be paid upon mail matter of the second class when sent by persons other than the publisher or news agent.

MRS. MARGARET CASSIDY.

Mr. MOREY, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for House bill 1370, a bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief Mrs. Margaret Cassidy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. STORM, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely upon the following; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 863) for the relief of Sarah M. Thomas;

Petition of Elizabeth Higgins and others, for compensation for property used by the United States Army; and Petition of Robert H. Cleer, for compensation.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely the following; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 347) for the relief of Joseph Hole;

Petition of William D. Wilson for compensation for rent and occupation of building; and Petition of Melchisadeck Robinson, for payment of stores taken by the United States Army during the war.

MARGARET CALLANAN.

Mr. FIEDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3951) for the relief of Margaret Callanan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of the last report of the Mississippi River Commission, and also 100 additional copies of said report with the plates bound separately, for the use of the said commission, to be done under the direction of its secretary.

LOOMIS'S AUTOMATIC FILTER.

Mr. FINDLAY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire whether a filter known as "B.T.Loomis's patent automatic filter" could not be advantageously introduced into the Capitol building for the purpose of filtering the water used therein, and that said committee report thereon at the earliest practicable moment what will be the cost of introducing the same.

DANIEL PARKER.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3952) for the relief of Daniel Parker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. OATES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so amended that no private bill shall be considered by any committee upon which a committee of any previous Congress has made an adverse report which was concurred in by the House, unless it be first shown to such committee that there is subsequently discovered evidence of a material character tending to show that such claim is just.

STANDARD TIME FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 616 for reference or consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask for the reference of the bill or its present consideration?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will ask for its present consideration, if there be no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let the bill be read.

The bill (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the legal standard of time in the District of Columbia shall hereafter be the mean time of the seventy-fifth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be construed to affect existing contracts.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not object to that.

The bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I suppose it is not in order to say anything on that bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. It has gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ACCOMMODATIONS FOR ENROLLING CLERKS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received an official communication from the Clerk of the House with regard to the accommodation of the enrolling clerks; and as the Chair is not aware of the existence of any unappropriated room about the Capitol he thinks it best to lay the communication before the House, that it may be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or take such other course as the House may decide. The communication will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1884.

SIR: In view of the action of the House on yesterday in relation to the assignment of committee-rooms, I deem it my duty to call your attention to the fact that the action taken leaves the enrolling and assistant enrolling clerk, the resolution and petition clerk, the newspaper and document clerk, and the distributing clerk without a room in which to perform their respective duties.

The room assigned the Clerk, now occupied by the Committee on Naval Affairs, is too small for occupation by the clerks above designated, there being in the enrolling-room six large desks, two large cases containing materials and records, including originals of all bills and joint resolutions passed and of all amendments thereto for the last twenty years, a table and a wardrobe which can not even be got in the room named.

It is impossible to assign more clerks to the file-room, it now being overcrowded, and in this connection I deem it proper to state that it is of the greatest importance that all of the clerks named should be in immediate proximity to the Journal Clerk and bill and printing clerk, whose desks are in the file-room, the work of the enrolling clerks, resolution and petition clerk, and newspaper and document clerk being entirely dependent on the Journal, and are required to be promptly dispatched.

I respectfully submit the matter for your consideration.

Very respectfully,

JNO. B. CLARK, JR., Clerk.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. In connection with the communication just read I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of the Clerk just read be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with instructions to inquire and report what provisions are required to be made to furnish the Clerk with proper accommodations for the necessary transaction of the official business of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Is this resolution broad enough to allow the committee to consider whether or not the room now occupied by the enrolling clerks shall continue to be so occupied?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I think it is broad enough to cover the whole ground.

Mr. KEIFER. If the resolution is not broad enough for that purpose it should be made so.

Mr. YOUNG. Should not this matter be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The resolution of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of business on the general Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade.

Mr. DINGLEY. In the absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] who reported this bill, I am requested by the committee to say that an understanding has been reached by which the bill is not to be taken up until to-morrow. In order that the bill may be laid aside in accordance with this arrangement, I object to its present consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to the consideration of the bill, the committee, under the rule, will rise and report the objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the public Calendar, had reached the bill (H. R. 2238) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, when objection was made to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill be passed over in the Committee of the Whole?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3520) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely:

Chapter 83, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes," except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Jackson to the line between the State of Mississippi and the State of Alabama," which road was completed within the time prescribed by said act.

Also, so much of chapter 41, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 17, approved June 3, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama, &c.," as relates to a grant of lands in aid of the construction of railroads from Elyton to the Tennessee River at or near Beard's Bluff, Alabama.

Also, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, in section 6 of said act.

Also, section 7 of the act of March 3, 1857, chapter 99, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 197, making a grant to the State of Alabama in aid of the Savannah and Albany Railroad Company, as recited in said section.

Also, so much of chapter 42, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 18, entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Louisiana to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," as relates to a railroad from New Orleans to the State line in the direction of Jackson, Miss.

Also, so much of chapter 165, fourteenth Statutes at Large, page 83, as makes a grant of lands to the State of Arkansas to aid in the construction and extension of a railroad from the point where the Iron Mountain Railroad intersects the southern boundary of Missouri to a point at or near the town of Helena, on the Mississippi River.

That all rights, titles, and privileges as to any of the public lands granted or conferred by, through, or under the said several provisions of law be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited and determined; that all the lands within the terms and scope of said several provisions of law be, and they are hereby, restored to the public domain, and subject to sale, disposition, and settlement under existing law as though said acts and parts of acts had never been enacted.

SEC. 2. That in any and all cases as to any lands embraced within the terms of any of the acts named in section 1 of this act, whenever the Department of the Interior, or its officers, or the local land officers have treated said lands as open to selection, purchase, or homestead entry, and have allowed purchases, selections, and entries of any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, the acts of the Department of the Interior and its officers, and the local land officers, in permitting such entries, selections, and purchases, in making such sales, and in issuing patents, certificates, and lists thereon, are hereby ratified and validated, and the rights and titles of parties or persons holding patents or claiming right or title under certificates or lists of lands issued or certified by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or certificates issued by the officers of the local land offices, or who have made homestead entries or pre-emption settlements or claims upon any of said lands in any way affected by said grants, are hereby confirmed and made valid to the same extent as though said grants had never been made.

Mr. COBB. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred sundry bills relating to the forfeiture of lands granted to certain States and railroad companies to aid in the construction of railroads, desire to make the following report as to a part of said bills, and ask further time in which to report as to the remaining bills:

Your committee find, by act of Congress passed August 11, 1856 (11 Statutes at Large, page 30), that lands were granted to the State of Mississippi, to be disposed of by said State in aid of the construction of three railroads, one from Jackson to the line between the States of Mississippi and Alabama, one from Tuscaloosa to the Mobile Railroad in Mississippi, and one from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico.

The first-named road was completed within the time prescribed by the act of Congress, as we are informed, and therefore we do not interfere with it in any way by this bill.

To aid in the construction of each of these roads every alternate section of public land, designated by even numbers, for six sections in width, on each side of the line of said roads, was granted to said State, with the right that in case of prior disposal of any of said sections or parts thereof by the United States to select other sections in lieu thereof within fifteen miles of said line of road. These grants were made available by the following section of said act of Congress:

"SEC. 4. That the lands hereby granted to the said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections for each of said roads, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of each of said roads, may be sold; and when the governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any continuous twenty miles of either of said roads is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted, not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections for such road, may be sold; and so from time to time until said roads are completed; and if said roads are not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

Your committee find that no portion of these roads has been completed, and no work ever done thereon, and no land has been approved to the State of Mississippi on account of the same.

By the sixth section of said act of August 11, 1856, a like grant, on like conditions, was made to the States through which said road should pass, "for a railroad from Mobile to New Orleans."

The road contemplated by this section has never been built or begun.

The road from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico was to be called the Gulf and Ship Island; that from Mobile to New Orleans, the Mobile and New Orleans; and that from Tuscaloosa to the Mobile Railroad was not named, it not having progressed far enough to require a name.

The sixth section of the act making these grants, which is set forth above, required the roads to be completed by August 11, 1866, more than seventeen years ago.

The last part of said section reads as follows:

"And if said roads are not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

Under the true construction of this act, the sale of these lands had to stop at the expiration of the ten years, and the title revert to the United States and reinvest therein as fully as if the grant had never been made. But in October, 1874, the Supreme Court, in the case of Shulenburg vs. Harriman (21 Wallace, page 44), decided that an act of Congress precisely like this granted an estate upon condition subsequent; that the title to the lands embraced in the act passed to the State in presenti, and could only be regained by an act of legislation equivalent to a re-entry at common law.

Under this decision it becomes necessary for Congress to pass an act which shall assert ownership in the lands in question, in order to repossess and have them restored to the public domain.

The lands now can not be sold by the United States, as it has only a right of re-entry, a right which can not be sold or assigned, and can only be made available by the original grantor, as the United States can have no heirs, and, we trust, no successors.

If, therefore, we desire these lands placed in the reach of actual settlers, we must pass some act so declaring. No Department has the power to do it. The power rests in Congress alone, under the above-named decision. As a period of twenty-eight years has elapsed and no work has been done on either of these roads, and nearly nineteen years of that period has passed since the close of the civil war, your committee feel that the purpose which Congress had in view in the passage of the act of 1856 will not be subserved by keeping the lands in question longer separated from the public domain, thus preventing them from being occupied and possessed by actual purchasers and settlers.

One of the reasons most strongly urged for making these grants was that the United States could well afford to give one-half its lands on the line of a proposed railroad, because it would thereby not only double the price of the remaining land but greatly expedite the sale of it. Such has been the result where railroads have been actually built, but the sole effect of the grant in question has been to prevent the sale and settlement of these lands and that of the adjoining country.

In the case of Shulenburg vs. Harriman, above referred to, it is held that the title to the land may be reinvested in the Government after the expiration of ten years by an act of Congress to that effect; and it is intimated in this decision that the sales may go on until such action on the part of Congress is had. Yet, even if that intimation be accepted as a settled rule of law, Congress can interpose at any time and terminate the grant with the railroad half completed. The road can have only a limited advantage from this grant as it now stands. Capital will therefore be unwilling to invest to carry out the terms of a grant which, so far as these lands are concerned, is determinable at the pleasure of Congress. Especially is this true when there is such a growing sentiment in the minds of the people in favor of the forfeiture of all land granted to railroad companies where such companies have failed to comply with the terms of the grant, and a growing feeling in opposition to granting subsidies of lands, &c., to corporations generally.

Your committee state that the claim is made that under the act creating this grant sales of land must cease at the end of ten years, whether Congress passes an act equivalent to re-entry or not; or, if made, the conveyance is subject to the same right of forfeiture by the act of re-entry as if it had not been made.

If this view should prove to be correct, and those who favor it insist that anything to the contrary in Shulenburg vs. Harriman is obiter dictum, then this grant in its present shape is of such small value as to no longer justify its presence on the statute books, and the only business-like course for Congress to adopt is to repeal it.

ELYTON AND BEARD'S BLUFF.

On June 3, 1856, Congress passed an act similar to the one we have just been considering, by which lands were granted to the State of Alabama to aid in the construction, among others, of a railroad "from Elyton to the Tennessee River at or near Beard's Bluff, Ala." The Secretary of the Interior reports as to this road that no map of location has ever been filed and no part of the road has ever been constructed. So far as known no corporation or company has ever been organized under this act. The time fixed for the completion of this road by the terms of the act was June 3, 1866. What has been said in regard to the grants heretofore named is also applicable to this one.

MEMPHIS AND CHARLESTON.

The State of Alabama refused to accept the grant for this road, and the lands were restored to market February 19, 1858. Your committee deem it prudent, however, to repeal the granting act so far as it refers to this road, and have provided for it in the bill presented.

IRON MOUNTAIN RAILROAD IN ARKANSAS.

By act of July 4, 1866 (14 Statutes, page 83), this grant was made. The act provided that the road must be completed within five years from July 1, 1866, or by July 4, 1871. The road was to have run from the southern boundary of the State of Missouri, where it was to be intersected by the Iron Mountain Railroad, to a point at or near Helena, Ark. No portion of this road has ever been located or constructed.

NEW ORLEANS TO THE STATE LINE.

This grant was made by act of Congress June 3, 1856 (11 Statutes, page 18), and consisted of alternate odd-numbered sections for six sections in width on each side of the road, with the right to take in place of any lands which were disposed of by the Government by entry or pre-emption, within the said six miles, the alternate sections within fifteen miles of said road. This grant was made to the State of Louisiana to aid in the construction of a railroad from New Orleans to the State line, in the direction of Jackson, Miss. No part of this proposed road has ever been constructed, and the lands were restored to the public domain, so far as the Department could do it, July 27, 1857. Previous to such restoration, to-wit, on the 6th of February, 1857, the governor of Louisiana advised the Land Office by telegram that he did not think the grant would be accepted.

In face of the facts which surround this grant your committee deem it prudent to repeal so much of the act as made said grant, providing, as the second section of the bill does, for the protection of persons holding patents from the Government and bona fide settlers, &c.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the facts set forth in this report, recommend the forfeiture of all the lands named therein, and for that purpose report the accompanying bill as a substitute for all the bills relating to the forfeiture of said grants, and recommend its passage.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

I dissent from the report of the majority of the committee, so far as relates to the grant to the State of Mississippi for the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, for the following reasons, among others:

By act of August 11, 1856, a grant of six sections per mile was made to the State of Mississippi for a road from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, with provision of sale by the State of the lands granted; it was also provided that if the road was not completed in ten years the lands unsold should revert to the United States.

It is admitted that the State has not sold any of said lands, and that no portion of the road has been constructed. The time expressed in the act for the unsold lands to revert in case the road was not completed of course expired August 11, 1866, more than seventeen years since, and now it is proposed by the majority report to forfeit the grant, and for the United States to resume title to these lands.

A map of definite location of the road was filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior November 27, 1860, a little over four years after the passage of act; so it would appear that up to that time the proper steps were being taken to avail of the grant.

The condition of affairs in this country in November, 1860, and for the six years following is matter of history; it was not an era of railroad building, and in the South the construction of new roads was out of the question. After the grant, and prior to November, 1860, it was not possible to make all arrangements and do all things necessary or requisite to perfect the grant, make surveys, locate the road, prepare and file maps and lists, and complete the road. It would probably require all that time to make all preliminary arrangements and get ready to commence building the road, and, as above remarked, after the latter date, and up to August 11, 1866, there was no possibility of doing any railroad work in that section, so that when the time came for the lands to revert under the act it was plainly no fault of the beneficiaries that the road had not been built. But we are told seventeen years have elapsed since August, 1866, and the road is neither completed nor commenced. True, and I contend that neither is that the fault of the State nor the incorporators of the road; and for this reason. After the ten years had elapsed in which the road was to be completed or the lands revert, they (the lands) could not be sold or mortgaged, or in any way availed of in the building of the road, for the obvious reason that purchasers and capitalists were afraid of the title. Let it be borne in mind all the time that the grant was not made to a corporation, but directly to the State of Mississippi; and it is a fact that the State and her people, in the seventeen years in which negligence is charged, have done all in their power to make the grant available; the people from time to time, in convention assembled, have called upon the Legislature to take all proper and possible means to have Congress renew or extend the grant, and the Legislature, time and again, have memorialized Congress accordingly. Nothing has been left undone on the part of the people or the State in the premises. And it is not venturing too far to say, had their petitions been granted the road would now be a fixed fact. So much on the subject of negligence.

Again, the line of the road, as surveyed, runs through vast bodies of finely timbered lands, the timber for the most part yellow or long-leaf pine, exceedingly valuable for lumber, but which can only be made available by means of railroads. The country for the most part is thinly settled; just such a country as presents the most serious obstacles to the construction of a road by private means, and where, if ever, a public grant is both requisite and proper.

The usual argument holds good in this case with unusual force, that the Government, so far from being a loser in any respect, would be greatly the gainer from the largely increased value of the public lands remaining. In addition to the vast timber resources, the lands when cleared would afford the best of pastures for unlimited stock, in addition to its great agricultural resources, and all in the most genial of climates.

The grant in the first instance was not only right but in every respect one eminently proper to be made, and all the reasons in its favor then exist in even greater force and abundance to-day. Other sections have been abundantly favored in this respect, ours in comparison but little. It is not a corporation struggling to retain its grant, but a State seeking to give her people an outlet to the sea.

The approximate estimate of the quantity of the land in the grant, as originally made, was 652,800 acres; since then much of it has been sold, and there are remaining in the grant at this time probably not over half a million acres. The line of the road, as surveyed and located, is 170 miles long, being less than 3,000 acres to the mile; a very moderate appropriation compared with many other roads which have profited by the bounty of Congress.

I am aware that great and serious abuses have grown out of and been connected with grants in aid of railroads, but in the case of the Gulf and Ship Island road no complaint or suspicion in this regard can be made or entertained; in almost every respect it stands apart from the great roads or corporations so much complained of in connection with their vast land grants. It should be judged by itself, and if it could be so judged with respect solely to its own merits, its friends could ask no more.

Knowing as I do how much the people of Mississippi have the construction of this road at heart, that there is no purpose or desire in connection with the grant foreign to the object for which it was made—the building of the road and the general good—I feel compelled to dissent from the report of the majority of the committee so far as relates to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

H. S. VAN EATON.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say that a majority of the Committee on Public Lands are anxious to go on with the consideration of this bill; but the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] who made the minority report tells me that he is unable to-day, on account of some personal affliction, to discuss this question. It would be agreeable to the committee, if it be the wish of the House, that this bill be laid aside until the health of the gentleman is recovered. We desire to hear from him, as he is the only member of the committee who dissents from the views of the majority. That gentleman being unwell to-day, we are willing that the bill be passed over, so that he may be heard when it is taken up for consideration. This is our only reason for consenting that the bill be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COBB. I desire simply to have the bill laid aside, not losing its place.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires that objection be made. That is the only way in which the bill can be laid aside.

Mr. COBB. I will make the objection pro forma, though I might make the motion that the bill be laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. RICE. Upon the statement which the gentleman makes I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why may not unanimous consent be given that the bill be laid aside? I have seen that done in Committee of the Whole time and again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it can not be done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It has been done.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection having been made to the present consideration of the bill, the committee will rise and report the objection to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust unanimous consent will be given that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Nobody will object.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done by unanimous consent.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Public Calendar, had reached the bill (H. R. 3520) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads, when objection was made to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill be passed over in Committee of the Whole?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

LEVEES OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3504) to close the gaps in the levees of the Mississippi River, and other structures for the improvement of the navigation and protection of the commerce of the said river.

The bill as amended by the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $1,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the improvement of the Mississippi River, which said sum shall be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, estimates, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission created by an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes, near its mouth, to its headwaters," approved June 28, 1879.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope, Mr. Chairman, we will hear some explanation of this.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to the further consideration of the bill, under the rule the committee will rise and report the objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having under consideration the bill (H. R. 3504) to close the gaps in the levees in the Mississippi River, and other structures for the improvement of the navigation and protection of the commerce of the said river, objection was made to its further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that when the bill which he has indicated was reached in its order objection was made, and under the rule that fact has been reported to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it now in order to move that the bill be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

The objection was sustained, and the bill was passed over for the present.

SPEEDY DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 1071) to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters at free-delivery offices and a special stamp to secure said delivery.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendments recommended by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, line 3, before the word "cents," insert "10," and strike out "shall" and in lieu thereof insert "may;" so it will read: "that a special stamp of a face valuation of 10 cents may be provided," &c.

In section 2, line 2, strike out "10" and insert "12;" so it will read: "up to 12 o'clock p. m."

In section 3, line 4, insert "$15;" so it will read: "not to exceed $15 per month."

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read as it is proposed to be amended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a special stamp of a face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the stamp required to be placed thereon to prepay the drop-letter rate of postage, or the rate required on letters mailed, and whose final delivery is to be at a free-delivery office, shall be regarded as entitling such letters to immediate delivery.

SEC. 2. That such extra-stamped letters shall be delivered up to 12 o'clock p. m.

SEC. 3. That to provide for the immediate delivery of letters which bear this special stamp in addition to the regular postage rates, parties shall be employed, at a salary not to exceed $15 per month, to such number as is absolutely required, at each free-delivery office, for such delivery, who, upon the delivery of such a letter, will procure a receipt from the party addressed, or some one authorized by him to receive such letter, in a book to be furnished for the purpose, which shall be kept in the post-office, and at all times subject to examination by an inspector of the Department.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it be in order, I will withdraw my objection in the case of the preceding bill, so it may be reported to the House and laid upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late, as the House has already disposed of the case and the bill has been passed over.

Mr. COSGROVE. Let the report of the committee on the pending bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1071, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The purpose of H. R. 1071, entitled "A bill to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters at free-delivery offices and a special stamp to insure said delivery," is to authorize the Postmaster-General to issue a special stamp, printed in such manner as to attract immediate attention, under such regulations as he may prescribe, the price thereof to be fixed at 10 cents each, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the stamp required to be placed thereon to prepay the regular postage prescribed by law and the final delivery of which letter is to be at a free-delivery office, shall entitle said letter to immediate delivery up to 12 o'clock midnight.

The committee desire, in this connection, to call attention to the recommendation made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General upon this subject:

"In view of the large excess of postage on local matter alone over the entire cost of the service ($1,021,894.01), and in view of the fact that experience has demonstrated that local correspondence is increased in proportion, especially in the large cities, and hence the postage on local matter in proportion, to the facilities given, I have no hesitation in recommending its extension, nor in advising liberal appropriations to bring it up to the highest practicable standard in cities where it is now in operation.

"As stated in my last report, this service meets the general demands of business and social life, but fails to meet the dispatch required in the delivery of letters of exceptional importance.

"Letters are now delivered by carriers at stated hours during the day from about 7 a. m. to 6 p. m., the frequency of trips varying in different cities, and also in the same city, more frequent deliveries being made in the business and less frequent in the suburban districts. Between these deliveries two or three hours frequenty intervene in the larger cities, and a longer time in the smaller ones, where the deliveries are less frequent. Letters received, therefore, after the carriers go out on their trips, whatever their importance, must lie in the office till the next trip. After the close of the deliveries for the day carriers' letters must lie over till the next morning delivery, which delay in many instances fails to meet the wants of the writer or the object of the communication. Out of this want of a more speedy delivery have grown up in several of the large cities private enterprises which are now conducted in competition with this service, and are diverting from the legitimate revenues of the Department thousands of dollars yearly. The patronage bestowed on these enterprises evinces a public demand for a more speedy delivery of a certain class of correspondence. To meet this want and to secure the entire postal business of this country, which properly belongs to the Department, it is suggested that a special stamp be provided, which, when affixed to a letter, whether mail or local in addition to the ordinary postage-stamp, shall be reguarded by the office addressed as entitling the letter to immediate delivery up to 10 o'clock p. m.

"To provide for the instant delivery of letters bearing this special stamp it is suggested that boys be employed and required to procure receipts from the party addressed, or some one authorized by him to receive such letters, in a book to be furnished for the purpose, which shall be kept in the office, and at all times subject to examination by an inspector of the Department."

The advantages which would result from the adoption of this special-delivery stamp are fully set forth in the extract above given. That it would be a convenience to the public which would be fully appreciated and liberally patronized the committee fully believe; that when the people become fully acquainted with the system and its advantages it would yield a handsome surplus revenue to the Post-Office Department.

In view of the advantages believed to exist in the adoption of this stamp the committee recommend its passage.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move that the amendment be agreed to and the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. I do not know that I can add anything to what is contained in the report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will make some explanation of the matter.

Mr. COSGROVE. The explanation of the bill is fully set forth in the report which has been read in the hearing of the House. It provides that in addition to the ordinary postage-stamp put on every letter, in order to insure delivery up to 12 o'clock at night, there shall be affixed an additional stamp of 10 cents, which shall be regarded as entitling such letter to immediate delivery.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To whom is that 10 cents to go?

Mr. COSGROVE. To the Government, as in the case of ordinary stamps.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will not such additional duty necessitate an increase of the free-delivery force?

Mr. COSGROVE. In some instances I presume it will. It has been suggested by the First Assistant Postmaster-General that, to provide for the instant delivery of letters bearing this special stamp, boys be employed at a salary of $15 a month.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has the gentleman any information from the Department as to the probable cost of this additional service?

Mr. COSGROVE. We have information that the income derived from this special stamp will be largely in excess of any cost which may be caused by this additional service. It is expected that it will afford a handsome revenue to the Government over the cost of carrying out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Upon what information is that opinion based?

Mr. COSGROVE. I suppose the officers of the Post-Office Department based their opinion upon their judgment and experience of the free-delivery system. We also are informed that the profits derived by private parties now engaged in various cities in transacting the very business which this bill provides for are very large.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to develop that fact, whether there are private parties now engaged in doing this very thing.

Mr. COSGROVE. My information from the Post-Office Department is that private parties, to a large extent, are engaged in this work, and derive from it handsome remuneration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Are they engaged in it in any other city than the city of New York?

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand that they are so engaged not only in the city of New York. but in the cities of Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Saint Louis, as well as in other places.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This extends to a very large number of offices. It extends to every free-delivery office in the United States.

Mr. COSGROVE. The bill, as the gentleman will perceive, leaves it discretionary with the Postmaster-General, as I understand it. The word "shall," which appeared in the original bill, has been stricken out. The original bill provided that the Postmaster-General should do this, whereas the amended bill specifies that he may, leaving it of course discretionary with him to establish the service or not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Would it not be better to say, if the Postmaster-General "shall" deem it advisable, in place of using the word "may?"

Mr. COSGROVE. I think the word "may" is sufficiently discretionary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is true, but some of the courts have decided that it means the same as "must" or "shall;" in other words, that in certain conditions it is peremptory.

Mr. COSGROVE. Under certain conditions, and under some statutes, I think so too; but evidently not in this case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I should much prefer, and I think it would meet the sense of the House, to have it so worded as to leave it discretionary with the Postmaster-General, by the insertion of the words "if he shall deem it advisable."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me for a moment I will answer the proposition which he makes to insert the words suggested by him instead of the word "may." The word employed in the bill carries with it a discretion on the part of the Post-Office Department. As an illustration of that fact let me state that a few Congresses ago the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], the present chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, introduced a bill providing that the Post-Office Department should issue double postal cards. The language of the bill was, "The Post-Office Department shall issue," &c. But the Post-Office Department has not used such a card. They certainly used discretion in that case where the word "shall" was employed. The reason that the word "may" is employed here was that the Post-Office Department might exercise discretion in the matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order, Mr. Chairman, to avoid any ambiguity on this point, which I regard as of considerable importance, I move to amend by striking out the word "may" and inserting the words "if deemed advisable by the Post-Office Department."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There should be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, if we have come to the time for considering this bill under the five-minute rule for debate and amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed the bill to be open to amendment at this time, not understanding that it was desired to have general debate upon it, and in view of the fact that a motion had been made to report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation. If it be desired to debate the bill under the five-minute rule the Chair will cause the bill to be read by sections.

Mr. KEIFER. That time, however, has not yet arrived until after the general debate has been concluded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My object in making the motion at the time I did was for the reason that a motion had been made, as the Chairman has suggested, to report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. KEIFER. But that motion could not be entertained at this time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. KEIFER. There will be a time of course when the gentleman will have an opportunity of offering his amendment or submitting his motion. But we desire to consider this bill under the rule. We have not understood that it is being considered now under the five minutes' debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri made a motion that the bill be reported to the House favorably.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that the bill is before the committee for general debate; and if the Chair will recognize me I would like to be heard upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my amendment be pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time to offer his amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. There will be, of course, a time when the gentleman can submit his amendment.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to hear what is being said, and was impossible to hear what was said by the gentleman who presented this bill. For my part, I doubt the policy of the measure, though I live in a city where there is a free-delivery office. I am not prepared to go so far as to favor a special delivery of letters by messengers in these offices alone, to the exclusion of all of the rest of the country. If it be a wise policy to enter upon at all, I would say that it ought to apply to all cities, whether they be free-delivery offices or not. I have now forgotten the number of free-delivery offices in the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is quite large, over 150.

Mr. KEIFER. I am told by a gentleman sitting near me that it is 152. It has grown from 88, then, a few years ago, to 152 at the present time, and perhaps that number is not likely to be very largely increased for some time to come.

These 152 offices, each of them, must have either a population of 20,000 inhabitants or more, or else under the existing law must produce a gross revenue of at least $20,000. That is the double test under which free-delivery offices are established by the Post-Office Department. Then this bill would apply to those offices alone, and every other office in a city containing a population of less than 20,000, or which does not produce at least $20,000 of gross revenue, is to be left entirely outside and can by no possibility under this proposed measure obtain the benefit of this messenger system. That is what it amounts to. Is it wise, then, to undertake to do the business that is now done by special messengers in these large cities, for out of that mode of doing the business and delivering notes or letters has grown this policy? I think not. The regulation of the Post-Office Department will have to be changed as to all these free-delivery offices if this bill should become a law.

I think none of them are required to keep open for the transaction of business so late as 12 o'clock at night.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order. There is a great deal of confusion. I can not hear the gentleman from Ohio, and I should like to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests gentlemen engaged in conversation to retire to the cloak-room. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will proceed.

Mr. KEIFER. The bill in its second section provides—that such extra-stamped letters shall be delivered up to 12 o'clock post meridian.

This would require the expense of keeping open, with suitable and trustworthy clerks, each of the free-delivery offices up to the hour of midnight. That is not essential under the present system at all. And it is not wise; it is extending the privilege of these free-delivery offices further than I think it ought to go unless the same privilege is extended to other offices not free-delivery offices. Extra clerks would have to be employed for all the drop-mail that came there. All the letters of this kind would have to be carefully examined each day and each evening and on up to midnight. To be sure that this law was complied with in the matter of the delivery of the extra-stamped letter there would be involved a very considerable expense.

The enormous sum that is proposed by this bill to pay to the messengers or carriers of $15 a month seems to indicate that it is the policy of those advocating this measure to employ some small boys, some children, to carry these important messages about in the day or at night. Boys to be employed at the rate of $15 a month would have to be on duty, if they continued during the entire day, unless they were relieved, from 7 o'clock in the morning till 12 o'clock midnight. There would have to be a number of them, as a matter of fact, or they would be unable to perform this duty. There might be a single letter at the hour of 11.30 p. m. come in to be delivered at a remote part of the city, perhaps in a city like New York, Philadelphia, or Chicago, or other large city, many miles from the point where it was delivered in the post-office.

Upon the whole I think the measure is not a wise one. I think it is one that would be impracticable. And while I am always in favor of extending every facility that can be afforded to benefit the business interests of a large city and the convenience or comfort or pleasure of the people, I still think this is undertaking to do what people had better have done through private enterprise. Therefore at present I do not feel in favor of this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I question the wisdom of this measure. In the first place, the moment these stamps are issued and service begins under this act the Postmaster-General must provide for this special delivery in all the free-delivery offices of the whole country. The act does not require it, but the fact of issuing the stamps and authorizing such delivery would authorize me or any one else to place such stamp upon a letter going to a free-delivery office; and then it would become the duty of the Department to employ immediately at that free-delivery office a special messenger.

The salary provided by this bill for the messenger is $15 a month. Well, that we understand very well is not a salary that would long continue. Before this service had existed one year Congress would be asked to increase the salary to something near the salary of regular-delivery messengers. The benefit to be gained by this additional service it seems to me is not commensurate at all with the cost it would involve.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if this service has been recommended by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. COSGROVE. It is; and his recommendation is set forth in the report.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. COSGROVE. I was instructed to make the report as a unanimous one from the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I still think it is not wise now to undertake this service in this way.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The report of the Postmaster-General will show that out of one hundred and fifty four free-delivery offices—that is the number I think as stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]——

Mr. SKINNER. Yes, sir; one hundred and fifty-four.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There are only fourteen that are self-sustaining from local postage receipts, so that there are in reality one hundred and forty free-delivery offices heavily burdening the Treasury of the United States. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that cities of 20,000 population and over to which free delivery is limited enjoy so much greater facilities than those of smaller cities and towns and of people who live in rural districts, that we ought to pause before we entail upon the people increased taxation to extend those facilities.

There are probably not more than four or five cities in which this increased service will be self-sustaining; in all others it will increase the already heavy burdens upon the tax-payers. New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Chicago, Saint Louis, Boston, and possibly one or two other cities, may furnish sufficient employment for a service of this kind to make it self-sustaining, or rather the revenue from this new 10-cent stamp as provided in the bill may be sufficient to pay for the increased force employed in those cities.

But, Mr. Chairman, I fear this will be simply the entering-wedge to an enormous increase of the cost of our postal department. The time will soon come, no matter how much the Postmaster-General may restrain them, when every town or city in the land which enjoys the free-delivery system will be petitioning Congress to have this very privilege extended to them. And, as has been well said by the gentleman from Ohio on my left [Mr. WARNER], the salary of $15 per month will grow till it becomes as much as the salaries of the ordinary free-delivery messengers are to-day. As I have already indicated, it seems to me we are entering upon a course that will result in an enormous increase of the present immense expenditures of the postal service.

Why, sir, do gentlemen forget the fact that the expenditures of the Post-Office Department have in twenty years grown from about eleven millions of dollars to the vast sum of about fifty millions annually?

I am fully aware that the rapid increase of our population, area of settlement, and commerce has necessarily increasd the cost of the service in the past, as it will undoubtedly in the future. While I am one of those who do not believe that we ought to insist that the postal service shall yield a profit to the Treasury, yet at the same time I believe that its advantages to those who use it are such as to require of us that we shall endeavor to put it upon a basis where it shall at least be as nearly self-sustaining as possible.

I am opposed to this bill. I do not believe it is a wise measure. I believe it will result in an unnecessary and enormous increase of the expenditures of the postal service. If the bill is adopted at all, it seems to me that we should put a provision in it, in such plain terms that neither the Postmaster-General nor any one else can misunderstand, requiring that the privileges granted by this bill shall be limited alone to such cities as shall bring in a sufficient revenue from this service to pay for the expense to be incurred by it. Perhaps we had better leave the establishment of the service discretionary with the Postmaster-General, and for that reason I have offered the amendment I have indicated.

For many reasons not stated I do not believe this bill should be adopted. I believe the service at which it aims should be left, as heretofore, to private enterprise. But if the bill shall pass at all we should put in it the guard that I have already intimated, requiring the Postmaster-General to limit this service to such offices as will show that it can be self-sustaining.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will ask how much time I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can have an hour.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I do not want that much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SKINNER. I do not object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. I am perfectly willing that every safeguard shall be thrown around this bill.

I am a believer in the present postal service of the United States. I want that service to be self-sustaining, and to reach out and benefit every one of the 50,000,000 of people who live under our Government to the best of its ability.

The fact is that if the last Congress had not reduced the postage on letters from 3 cents to 2 cents (a great benefit to the people) the Post-Office Department to-day would have poured into the Treasury a surplus of $2,000,000 annually.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] speaks of the enormous increase in the expense of running the Post-Office Department. That is true. But does he not remember that the amount of postal matter has increased in like proportion? Consult to-day the records in regard to any post-office in the nation, and compare the amount of mail matter now received and sent out from that office with the amount received and sent out twenty years ago. In one city alone during the last twenty years the increase I believe has been eighty-fold.

Now I will revert to some of the objections made to this bill by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. I disagree with him, because I believe it to be a wise measure. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads disagree with him, because they recommend the passage of this bill as a wise measure.

It will not interfere with any class of business whatever. It is true that in the large cities there are companies for supplying messenger service, and it is also true that those messenger companies in the large cities are making independent fortunes out of this system of delivery. Why not, then, allow the Government of the United States, through its agents, to extend privileges of a like character, provided those who wish to enjoy them are willing to pay all the expense?

As has been stated, there are one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices in the United States. It is to be considered that those one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices comprise a very large share of the business interests of the country. Those one hundred and fifty-four offices receive and deliver a large amount of all mail matter received and delivered in the United States.

I say, further, that a free consultation has been had with the Post-Office Department, and that Department is willing to test the question and see whether this service will pay or not. The discretion was put in this bill that the Department might do so. I believe it will be the purpose of the Department to introduce this system whenever and wherever it can be assured that the receipts will cover the expenses.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has the Postmaster-General recommended this measure in his annual report?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. The report of the Postmaster-General includes the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who does recommend this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But the Postmaster-General himself, as I understand, does not recommend it in his annual report.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I am not prepared to say about that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not recollect seeing any such recommendation in his report, and I have read it carefully.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Not perhaps in special terms, but by implication he does recommend it.

The objection has been urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that this bill will require the large post-offices to be kept open to a very late hour. Not any more than they are to-day. They are obliged to be kept open to receive the mails whenever they shall arrive, and a clerk or an agent is obliged to be present at that time. Now, what is to prevent him from opening the mails and if he finds a letter with a special-delivery stamp on it have it delivered at once?

If members will reflect a moment they will find that every one of us may have occasion to use a special-delivery stamp almost any time in the week. When we desire to send letters to our homes that may reach there at night or on a Sunday, if this special stamp is provided, which we buy ourselves and which will pay the expense of delivery, what is the objection to allowing the agents of the Government to send that letter at once to our doors?

It is a step in advance; it is one element of progress in postal facilities.

The objection is made that boys are to be used to make these deliveries, and we are in a certain sense censured indirectly for want of generosity, the allowance of $15 a month being urged as proof. Do not gentlemen remember that all these great delivery companies in the large cities use boys for the delivery of their messages? We employ boys to deliver our messages on this floor. The recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General is that boys shall be employed for this service, because they can be obtained at reasonable expense in almost any city. I know that in the city in which I reside boys who will not be required to use their whole time in this business may be obtained; they can be readily reached when required to be sent upon these errands. In the larger cities they will have constant employment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would be in favor of extending this system, if it were practicable, to every post-office in the United States. The purpose of the introduction of the bill is to test its practicability; to put in the hands of the Postmaster-General this simple discretionary power.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would the gentleman permit an amendment extending this system to offices in towns of four or five thousand inhabitants? I see no reason why this special delivery should be limited to free-delivery offices. Why not extend it to towns of four or five thousand inhabitants?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. So long as the provision is contained in the bill that the Postmaster-General may extend the system if he deems it advisable, I see no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. But the bill as presented embodies the views of the First Assistant Postmaster-General as well as the views of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am of opinion that the proposed legislation is in the right direction. In all free-delivery cities letters, drop-letters or others, are delivered by carriers for two cents postage. Of course these letters are delivered at stated times. It frequently happens that persons desire letters to be delivered at once, and to meet that demand private persons do a large business in making such deliveries, especially in New York. This bill enables the writer of a letter, who desires its immediate delivery through the post-office, to secure the same by the affixing of a 10-cent stamp thereto. I believe the revenues from the extra postage will more than pay the cost of the extra service.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman state whether this is intended to apply only to free-delivery offices?

Mr. CANNON. I understand it applies only to free-delivery offices.

Mr. REAGAN. Why is it that a 10-cent stamp must be placed on the letter?

Mr. CANNON. To secure its immediate delivery.

Mr. REAGAN. Those that have not a 10-cent stamp upon them——

Mr. CANNON. They will be delivered just as they are now delivered.

Mr. REAGAN. Would not this involve necessarily the deferring of the delivery of other letters until the delivery of these 10-cent letters?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS. Who would deliver these 10-cent letters?

Mr. CANNON. The persons spoken of in the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Would not the carriers be taken away from their regular work to attend to this business?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; these special deliveries would not be made by the regular carriers. I did not report this bill, yet as I caught its provisions during the reading it provides that boys, at $15 per month, shall be employed to make these special deliveries.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see anything about boys in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. At any rate it speaks of employés at $15 a month, and in the cities messenger service is generally performed by boys, and if this bill passes I have no doubt boys will do most of the special service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I would like a few moments longer.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill does not say anything about boys.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who is familiar with this subject, whether provision is not now made by which letters are delivered many times daily in these free-delivery cities?

Mr. CANNON. I understand that in the city of New York there are many deliveries of letters during the day; in other cities deliveries are not so frequent.

Mr. REAGAN. Are not letters delivered a dozen times every day in New York city?

Mr. CANNON. That may be, and from the efficiency of the service in New York there is a large surplus of revenue from the free-delivery service. The more efficient the service the larger the revenue. In other cities the delivery is not so frequent as in New York.

Mr. REAGAN. But in all of them there are deliveries more than once a day—several times a day?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. These special deliveries are to be made by a new corps of employés?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, as I understand the bill, by additional employés; the carriers have their hands full with the present service.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No, if the gentleman will allow me, not by a new corps, but by assistants called in to secure a more speedy delivery after the other carriers have gone off duty for the night or perhaps in the morning before they come upon duty.

Mr. REAGAN. We now have telegraphs and telephones and messenger service in all the principal cities, which can be used for immediate service in case of necessity and at a cheap rate.

Mr. CANNON. This bill does not interfere with the telegraph or telephone. It is a matter of public notoriety, as the gentleman from Texas knows, that private persons in New York have heretofore successfully established private post-offices, with corps of messengers, to make immediate delivery of letters at times when the carriers of the post-office could not be utilized, thereby embarrassing the Department and seriously affecting its revenues. I think it wise for the Government, as long as it is in the post-office business, to furnish facilities to do that business, and I have no doubt it will be profitable, not only in convenience to the people, but in dollars and cents to the postal revenues.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, the intent of the provisions of this bill evidently is not to abolish any service now in use but is to afford additional service, and a service for which those who employ it are to pay out of their own pockets.

It is true there are now three daily mail deliveries in a large number of cities, but that free delivery is not of sufficient importance in many places to warrant deliveries at different hours from those when deliveries are now usually made. The purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to provide more frequent, or at least later, deliveries of letters. This matter of delivery is now done by private parties in several cities of the United States. If you are a resident of the city of New York, by giving the key to your box to a private corporation you can have your letters delivered up to 12 o'clock at night by the payment of the charge of 25 cents for each letter so delivered. The object of this bill is to provide for the same delivery at the same hour by the carriers of the Government, and that the Government shall be paid an additional sum of 10 cents for each letter. I see no objection to it. I believe it will be self-sustaining. If those who choose to avail themselves of this system are willing to pay the expense thereof, what objection can there be thereto?

It is said the Government will be necessitated to employ more men. Suppose it is. Is there any objection now to the employment of men to discharge the duties required by them in affording the postal facilities required by the citizens of the United States? It seems to me it is the duty of the Government to go on step by step, as they have gone in this post-office business, and from day to day and year to year afford such facilities in that line as shall be adequate to the business and social wants of every citizen.

It has been said that in but a few cities will it pay to any extent. Grant it. It is the cities which now pay a large proportion of the net revenue of the Government so far as the post-office is concerned. If only such places and States as are self sustaining so far as the Post-Office Department is concerned were to have mail facilities, I take it a large portion of the population of the United States would be deprived entirely of any such facilities.

This bill takes a step in the right direction. It enables the Government to afford to its citizens, to the business men of the country especially, such facilities as they demand and such facilities as their business requires. It is to allow the Government to do that which is now done by private individuals and corporations. The local express companies would be exceedingly glad to have the carrying of letters in New York, Philadelphia, and other large cities. Perhaps they would carry them cheaper and more promptly than the Government now does. But the whole business should be in the hands of the Government for obvious reasons. The intent of the bill is to save the people from the necessity of going to private corporations to have this service performed, and to enable the Government to do it to the extent which may be deemed necessary.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I feel a great interest in this measure, and had prepared an amendment to extend the provisions of the bill with the idea of making it applicable to certain cities in my own district in which I feel a personal interest; but after being informed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] that such a provision might somewhat jeopardize the passage of the bill, I decided to withhold it.

I believe that this measure is a step in the right direction. There are many persons upon this floor from the West who know that the Wells-Fargo Express Company in addition to carying packages of money also provide for carrying letters, and upon the payment of a small sum in addition to the cost of carriage will deliver letters immediately upon the arrival of the mails. Any person, for the small sum of 5 cents, can have his letter taken by the Wells-Fargo Company and delivered immediately in any of the small cities lying along the line of the railroads in the West. Now, it seems to me if the Wells-Fargo Express Company can for this small amount of 5 cents deliver a letter, that the United States postal agency for the sum of 10 cents could deliver a letter, especially in all of the free-delivery offices in the United States where the machinery is already partly supplied. The amendment that I had prepared contemplated the striking out of the words in line 9 of section 1, "a free-delivery office," and the insertion of the words "in any office in a city of four thousand or more inhabitants," thus carrying it to those cities that have now no free-delivery system. But I believe with the gentleman from New York that this is in the nature of an experiment and that the bill as proposed will demonstrate the practicability of the undertaking, and therefore I favor giving it a fair trial first.

Now when you come to the objection that has been urged that these boys of 15 years of age can not do this business——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is nothing in the bill about the employment of boys of 15 years of age.

Mr. PETERS. That these boys, for the sum of $15 a month——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is nothing in the bill about the employment of boys at all.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman will understand, and the committee will understand, and the inference is plain from the bill itself and the arguments of the gentlemen which have already been made upon it, that this delivery will necessarily be made by boys who may be employed at the rate of $15 a month, for that is the limit fixed by the bill for their compensation, and it could scarcely be expected that any other than boys could be employed at any such rate. But the point I am going to make is this, and it is well known to all business men, that this system could be safely intrusted to boys of that age, because the bill itself provides, as I understand it, that when letters are delivered in accordance with this system a receipt shall be taken from the person who shall receive the letter showing that it has been delivered, and therefore it renders the delivery system perfectly safe and secure.

Everybody knows that in those cities where the free-delivery system prevails boys can be obtained for $15 per month who can deliver and do deliver promptly and safely messages and letters; and it is no objection to the messenger system that they are so employed. It is said that this will be an additional force. That is very true, and therefore it imposes no additional labor upon the present messengers of the Post-Office Department; and I do not believe that there is a man on this floor who will say that the revenues to be derived from this system will not be more than ample to pay the additional outlay. It therefore imposes no additional expense upon the Government. The number of persons employed for the service will be only the number actually required, and certainly the fee charged will provide an ample fund for their compensation.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I certainly can see no objections to the bill; and as it has come to us recommended by the high authority of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and recommended also by implication by the Postmaster-General himself, I think it is in the nature of such legislation as we should cordially indorse.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the policy of this Government has been radically wrong and is radically wrong to-day. We go upon the theory that the Post-Office Department and all matters connected with the transmission of the mails and their delivery to the people should prove to be self-sustaining. Do we expect the Army to be self-supporting? Do we expect the Navy to be self-supporting? Or could you by any stretch of the imagination expect the Treasury Department to be self-sustaining? So far as regards these offices it ought to be. But what is the proposition here? To allow a citizen to pay 10 cents to the end that he may have his letter promptly delivered. Now, I am, for instance, a dilettante gentleman from the city of New York. Under the present system I get a love-letter from my sweet inamorata while I am sitting at the table at breakfast. That comes by a carrier. My business letter goes meanwhile to my office, all in the hands of a carrier. Out in the West are hundreds of thousands of men who have blazed the trail on which the path of empire has gone. Why should they not have the privileges and advantages of one of these elegant, effeminate, rich gentlemen of the city of New York or Philadelphia? [Laughter].

This is a general bill as I take it, and I have read it carefully through, a bill to accord Government privileges to the good people of this country.

The miner who rests at night in his cabin on the mountain side, with his tallow dip, is just as much entitled to receive by a carrier a letter sent by his wife as any gentleman living in any city in this Republic. And I say that whether the Post-Office Department is self-sustaining, or whether we have to contribute money to carry it on, it is our duty to do it. And I hope in the name of God that this House will have the sense to realize that fact that it is our duty to get out of the Treasury of the United States the hundred millions that are kept there in idleness.

A MEMBER. Put your four feet in. [Laughter].

Mr. BELFORD. You gentlemen may smile. But next year when you go before the people of this country, and are met with the fact that there are failures all over it, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hoarding up the money in close vaults, you will have to struggle for some argument to defend the Republican party on a policy of that kind.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I shall not occupy half that time.

I do not know that I can add anything to what is stated by the report. If gentlemen listened carefully to the reading of the report they will have all the information they will need on this question. It is not denied that this is an experiment. The objection that it would take away part of the private messenger business, as seems to be apprehended by the gentleman from Ohio on my right [Mr. KEIFER], was not considered a serious objection by the committee. On the contrary, it was argued, as an advantage of the measure, that it would take a part of that business to the post-office, where it properly belongs. That it will be self-sustaining is the report of the Post-Office officials. Whether it will be so or not is a matter of experiment; but it is such an experiment as we are perfectly willing to try.

A record will be kept, and I suppose will be honestly kept, of just how much it costs to run this particular service; and at the next Congress if it is found this is an expensive luxury it will be done away with entirely.

The fact that it will be extended to all free-delivery offices ought not to alarm any gentleman on this floor. That same argument would cut off all mail service in remote localities in this nation. It is a well-known fact now that in large cities the regions densely inhabited pay for the service in localities which are sparsely populated. You may argue this is to be a luxury that may be paid for by New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Chicago, Boston, and a few of the large cities, but that the rest of the cities where there is free delivery will enjoy this luxury without paying anything to keep it up. The same argument would do away with nine-tenths of the service that is now being enjoyed by this great nation.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General recommends this experiment. The bill provides for a 10-cent stamp. Perhaps 8 cents, perhaps 5 cents will be sufficient. The committee in agreeing upon 10 cents is quite sure that will pay more than all the expenses. But if it shall be found that 5 cents will pay this delivery, then the next Congress can direct that that rate shall be reduced to 5 cents, or that the privilege shall be extended to all first and second, and, if you please, third class post-offices.

There is not a single one of these free-delivery offices in the district which I represent. But, sir, I believe that my constituents remotely situated from these great centers I have named will enjoy the benefit of this free delivery as much as the cities in which it is located. As well might the fingers say to the lungs or to the heart, "I have no need of thee," as for the country offices to say "because New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and a few other large cities are the cities that will sustain this system they alone are to be the beneficiaries; therefore we will not try it." This is a national work. And if you will hear the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General again read I think without any doubt you will give the proposed system a fair trial. I ask the Clerk to occupy the remainder of my time in reading that portion of the report which is the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

In view of the large excess of postage on local matter alone over the entire cost of the service ($1,021,894.01), and in view of the fact that experience has demonstrated that local correspondence is increased in proportion, especially in the large cities, and hence the postage on local matter in proportion to the facilities given, I have no hesitation in recommending its extension nor in advising liberal appropriations to bring it up to the highest practicable standard in cities where it is now in operation.

As stated in my last report, this service meets the general demands of business and social life, but fails to meet the dispatch required in the delivery of letters of exceptional importance.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This bill has only come under my eye since we took it up in the Committee of the Whole; but its provisions commend themselves to my mind with great force. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I am glad we have before us a proposition that will not disturb in my judgment the hundred millions which so constantly attract the genius of my friend from Colorado. I am also glad we have a proposition which does not invite partisan debate. I believe we have before us a question which as American Representatives we can meet honestly, and fairly discuss from the standpoint of the interests of our common country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one thing is settled by this Government, and that is that the United States shall carry the letters of the people. That proposition is settled and has been crystallized into legislation for years. Innovations are attempted, as has been developed by debate already on this floor; but the people want the mails carried by the Government, and I believe that this legislation is in that direction.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask him this question: Is there a single town or city in his district that would enjoy the privilege of this bill?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My own city, the beautiful city of Dubuque, I will inform the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will enjoy the privilege.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Are there any other cities——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I had sincerely hoped that a gentleman of his learning, living in the adjoining State of Illinois, would have known more about the State of Iowa than he seems to do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is the first time I ever knew the gentleman lived in Dubuque.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is the city of Dubuque, in my district, and in the State the cities of Davenport, Burlington, Keokuk, Muscatine, Des Moines, Council Bluffs, and I think Sioux City.

Mr TOWNSHEND. I was not aware, in the first place, that the gentleman lived in Dubuque; and I was certainly not aware that all the cities he has named were in his district.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not say they were in my district. I mentioned the city of Dubuque, in my district, and then I mentioned other cities in the State. I am unfortunate in that the gentleman does not know where I live. I hope that during our future intercourse in this House we shall become better acquainted. [Laughter.]

Now, in the few minutes I have left I desire to say that Iowa is not like Illinois, or like New York, or like Massachusetts, with one great, grand, towering metropolis. Iowa is a State made up of a great many healthy, vigorous cities, and the one in my district which I have named is one of them. I believe that all those cities will be benefited by this legislation.

We are a commercial country, and this bill is to benefit the commercial interests of this country, and I believe the commercial interests will pay for it. If we can now carry letters for 2 cents, it seems to me that 10 cents additional will pay all the extra cost of their prompt delivery, and at the same time furnish employment to a great many boys who will be glad to discharge the duties under this bill faithfully and well for $15 a month.

This measure is needed. Right here in the capital city of the nation I have mailed letters that did not reach their destination in Washington within forty-eight hours, and I have been compelled to pay 20 or 25 cents to insure the prompt delivery of a letter in this city. Now, if right here within the sight of the Dome of this great Capitol I can not insure the delivery of a letter within forty-eight hours without being compelled to pay 20 or 25 cents for a special messenger, I certainly would be glad if some means were provided that would enable me to insure its prompt delivery for 10 cents.

I have no feeling on this subject. When I read the bill I was glad to observe its provisions. I believe it will be of service to the great living, throbbing, commercial interests of this country, who will have to pay for the expense of this benefit. I am heartily in favor of the bill.

Mr. REED. I desire to make a suggestion to the House. It seems to me that this bill has arguments all on one side. If it so be that letters can not be delivered under it in the small towns, it does happen, on the other hand, that if a man lives in a small town, no matter how unfriended or alone it may be, and he wants a letter delivered in New York or Chicago before midnight, this bill will facilitate his business as much as it will the business of the man in Chicago or New York who receives his letter. Consequently in giving this advantage to the man living in a large city we also give it to his correspondents all over the country.

We extend these facilities as we go along; we can not extend them except in proportion as population increases. It seems to me that it is a sort of dog-in-the-manger argument to say that because we can not have all the advantages of this thing therefore nobody else shall have them; especially when you consider that we will get at least half the advantage that the man gets who lives in a large city, because by means of the plan which this bill proposes we can communicate with him promptly. It seems to me that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen has fifteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I desire to reserve that time until later in this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] five minutes of my time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think there are reasons, and sufficient reasons, why this bill should not become a law. It is admitted, even by the most enthusiastic advocates of the bill, by the author of the bill himself, who so far has had control of the time during which it has been discussed, that it is an experiment. I undertake to say that as an experiment it will prove a failure in the main.

What does the bill provide? It provides that you shall go out and employ parties to deliver this mail matter—at what cost? At $15 a month! Now, if any member upon this floor can show me a class of employés of the Government of the United States who are serving it at even $40 a month I will give up the question. There is no such class, and to expect that we can obtain them is altogether Utopian.

If we pass this bill we will start the entering-wedge, and next year they will come before us with the most pitiful pleas ever heard, stating that we ought to increase the compensation of these fifteen-dollar employés; that they have to serve the Government at late hours, until midnight, and therefore we ought to increase their pay.

Reference has been made to the fact that our pages here are nothing but messengers of this kind. Now, to illustrate what this will cost, let us consider what our messengers here cost us. We pay them $60 a month. I do not say that complainingly; they serve us faithfully and well. But I refer to that fact to illustrate that we can not obtain these services for $15 a month.

I can readily see, Mr. Chairman, how any man who desires to extend the office-holding class of this Government, the patronage of the party in power in this Government, be that party Republican or Democratic, can go enthusiastically to work for this measure. We have already had too much of that. The officers of the United States number to-day, I believe, 110,000. What is the consequence? They are as unwieldy as the Mississippi that pours its waters upon the Gulf. Already the clamor has come up from that innumerable host seeking to serve the Government at a price which can not be obtained in private employment. Already we have had one President shot down by a representative of the gang of office-seekers. What more? It has grown to be the case that the party which created the offices can not control them, and in order to get rid of this trouble you have had to call in the aid of a commission and provide that the recommendation of a member of Congress shall go for naught.

Now, the true theory of government is to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and let him do all else for himself. We shall violate that principle if we undertake to do this work. New York already has a letter delivery eleven times daily. Let any man who wants his mail delivered more frequently than that pay the messenger.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee one question. I understand the gentleman to say that these messengers can not be obtained at $15 a month. If that be the fact, will it not in effect defeat the operation of the bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Ah, you may start the system at that rate, but he who has watched the course of legislation here knows that a tempting bait in the way of low compensation is always held out until the office is created; and then all the power of Congress can not abolish the office.

One word in addition. The gentleman from New York complains that these messenger companies in the large cities are making fortunes out of their business. It is a legitimate business. It is a fair business enterprise; and we saw the gentleman complaining here last Congress because the Government was not lending aid enough to business men in enabling them to make fortunes. Now, I do not wish to interfere with the carrying of the mails; but I do say that when a man's business requires such expedition that from four to eleven mail deliveries daily will not satisfy him he ought to employ at his own expense messengers to do the work; and those who are engaged in meeting such demands in the way of the delivery of letters are not to be complained of because they are earning their legitimate wages.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, what is the object of the bill as shown by the bill itself and the arguments offered in its favor? I take it that one of its objects is to create a new class of Government employés; and I have no doubt the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was right from his standpoint in suggesting that it would furnish employment to a great many people, to be paid by the Government. One of the objects of the measure, it seems, is to help to make this a great paternal government, that is to take care of the fortunes and interests of all classes, rich and poor, old and young. We have already Government employés numbering over a hundred thousand. That member of Congress who can devise a system which would reduce this number would be a patriot and a benefactor to his country. He who devises a system to fasten new classes of employés upon the Government—employés useless and unnecessary—is doing his country a detriment.

What is the object of this bill? Simply to organize a messenger service by the Government in competition with private messenger service. Why not have a Government service extending to the furnishing of hacks and drays, the men in charge of these vehicles being paid by the Government? Why take the messenger service away from private individuals?

As suggested by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], there are in the city of New York eleven daily deliveries of mails. That, it seems, is not enough. There would appear to be a fear that some letter might not reach its destination by midnight.

If this be so, then the service is inefficient and unequal to the object of its organization. But I take it, it is unjust to that service to assume that it does not deliver all the mails daily with necessary promptitude. The object of this bill must really be to create a new class of public officers. It is said that the employés under the bill are to receive only $15 a month; but what the compensation may be hereafter under another bill, if this measure be now adopted, no man in this House can tell. But, sir, if the salaries of these Government messengers at $15 a month, or $180 a year, are not paid out of the proceeds of these messenger stamps at 10 cents each, the deficiency is to be paid from the public Treasury. What does that mean? It means we are to organize a messenger service for cities of 20,000 inhabitants or more, that service not to be paid for by its beneficiaries, but to be paid for, in large part at least, out of the public Treasury. Why should we adopt such a measure? We seem to have forgotten that we in this country are not authorized to take money from one man to give it to another without consideration; that we are not authorized to enrich some at the expense of others; that the very object of our Government is to protect all alike and to give exclusive privileges to none.

Yet we must now have a paternal government to go one step further and add five or ten thousand more to the list of employés. I do not know how many it will take, but it must certainly take a great many messengers to carry these letters around in all free-delivery cities having a population of 20,000 inhabitants and over.

Where is there any limitation in the bill? None at all. Take the city of Washington, with its one hundred and seventy or one hundred and eighty thousand people. Under this bill how many messengers may he employ at $180 a year to do this service? Who can tell? It will depend on how many friends he has or how many cases of charity may appeal to his sympathies and whom he can aid at the Government expense.

I wish to protest against this character of legislation; against this paternal system which takes away from private individuals the business which properly belongs to them and puts it into the hands of the Government; against the system which taxes one part of the public for the exclusive benefit of another part of the public; against anything which indicates a disposition to make this a paternal Government; against anything which tends to show this is to be a Government not for the welfare of the whole people, but merely for the benefit of privileged classes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a minute or two longer.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman the time he requests.

Mr. REAGAN. One word further, Mr. Chairman. Another thing to be suggested in the history of our Government is this: We started out with the idea that privileged classes and monopolies should not be permitted to exist within our limits. And yet what is our condition? To-day there is not a government beneath the sun, not excepting Italy, that is so monopoly-ridden, so class-ridden as the Government of the United States. Yet we go on step by step piling up burdens on the masses of the people for the benefit of classes. What made Italy recently a land of impoverished nobles, bandits and beggars? It was because that government undertook the paternal business of absorbing all the business into its own hands. And whenever we leave the safe mooring of the common law, where each individual man is left with his sterling manhood to protect his rights, and undertake to make a law which shall absorb all business of young and old, male and female, into the hands of the Government, we prepare to take away the spirit of independence, the spirit of reliance from our people—that spirit which has made us the energetic and prosperous people we are. I pray, sir, we may not go further in that line.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the one hundred millions of surplus revenue in the Treasury of the United States is likely to work great evil to this country. It excites the cupidity of every man who has an itching palm. It breeds extravagance on every hand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], it seems, never takes the floor during this session without clamoring for some sort of legislation which will distribute the surplus now in the Treasury. If that gentleman was as careful of the interests of the tax-payers as he seems to be of the tax-eaters of the country he would be in favor of inaugurating legislation which would not increase the tax-eaters, but would seek to reduce the surplus in the Treasury by the only way it can properly be accomplished, and that is by the reduction of taxation. The best blessing you can bestow upon the overburdened tax-payers of the country is to leave the surplus in their pockets, and not take it from the laborers who are working in the fields and mines. Instead of taking the money from them which forms this surplus you would confer a blessing upon them by lightening their taxes and cost of living. Let us inaugurate a new era in the country. Let us do away with the old policy of "addition, division, and silence." Let us enter upon a career of reduction of expenditures, reduction of taxation. Let us proceed at once to retrench by cutting off the sources from which this great surplus comes.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not yield, as I have only five minutes. This bill is a step toward a very large system of extravagance. Take the free-delivery service as it is. It started in 1863. At the beginning there were but 685 carriers employed by it, at an annual expense of $317,000. What is it to-day? In twenty years it has grown until the carriers number 3,680, at a cost, last year, to the tax-payers, of $3,173,636. The Postmaster-General, in his annual report, certifies to us the fact that out of the 154 free-delivery offices in the country only 14 are self-sustaining. I say to you that if you now enter on this legislation you will put in an entering-wedge which will, in all probability, result in duplicating the present number of salaried employés of the free-delivery system. You will not only have to increase the number of carriers, but you will probably have to increase the clerical force in every free-delivery office.

I would be glad if every miner in camp in Colorado who, as the gentleman from Colorado has said, is lighted to his work by the aid of a tallow-dip, should have the privilege of enjoying the benefit of the free-delivery system. I would be glad if every farmer in my Congressional district could have his letters delivered to him daily or nightly at his door, as the gentleman from Colorado seems to desire. But what would be the expenditure for so furnishing such facilities to persons living remote from the centers of population? The immense cost can not now be conceived. This bill, which is apparently so harmless, will, if adopted, grow like the small beginning of a stream which has swollen into a large and lengthy current.

Mr. BRUMM. Does not the gentleman know that the free-delivery system pays over a million of dollars surplus into the Treasury every year? Why then talk of taxing the people for this thing?

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to know whether this bill is debatable under the five-minute rule, or whether members of this House have to go down on their knees and ask the consent of the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Georgia to discuss this measure?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it will be debatable under the five-minute rule when we come to the proper point.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill for the reason that this committee is not fully informed, certainly not informed to such an extent as would justify it in acting upon this subject at all as it has undertaken to act. What have we, sir, upon the subject? The gentlemen who are advocating this bill and representing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads tell us that there has been an estimate made by somebody, and that it is thought it will pay expenses if the system be adopted. I have before me the report of the Postmaster-General made to the present Congress. I have examined that report very carefully, and I undertake to say that while the Postmaster-General has recommended many other suggestions to our consideration for legislative action and has pointed out certain needed improvements in the postal service, he has abstained from it in this respect, and certainly, has not thought it worth while to place it in his report. But, say the gentlemen representing this measure, and they are driven to the acknowledgment the First Assistant Postmaster-General says so and his views accompany those of the Postmaster-General himself, and therefore we understand that what is recommended by the First Assistant Postmaster-General bears also the indorsement of the Postmaster-General.

Now, if gentlemen will take the trouble to examine on page 104 of this report of the Postmaster-General, containing a portion of that report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, it will be found that he, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, is insisting upon the reduction of postage on local letters, while if they will turn to page 27 of the Postmaster-General's report proper, they will find the Postmaster-General combating the views of the First Assistant in that respect. May that be called also an indorsement of the recommendation. How often does it happen that subordinates make recommendations in their reports to Congress which the heads of Departments find it necessary to antagonize? I remember once in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who recommended certain changes which he proposed in the compensation allowed to railroads for carrying the mails, when the matter was taken up in the committee-room the Postmaster-General saw so much danger in it that he came to the room of the committee himself and protested against it as injurious to the great masses of the railroads in the country, as well as an increase in the expense of the service. Do gentlemen, in view of these facts, expect us, when the Postmaster-General omits to make recommendations on the subject, when there is nothing for our guidance except ten lines in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General—do they expect us to assume the responsibility of such legislation as this? Are we to adopt it without recommendation or estimates? There is not a word of discussion of estimates save one, and I beg leave to call attention to it. This is about all we have in the way of cost or of economy of the service or its importance; and I ask your attention to it while I read it:

Letters are now delivered by carriers at stated hours during the day, from about 7 a. m. to 6 p. m., the frequency of trips varying in different cities, and also in the same city more frequent deliveries being made in the business and less frequent in the suburban districts. Between these deliveries two or three hours frequently intervene in the larger cities, and a longer time in the smaller ones, where the deliveries are less frequent. Letters received, therefore, after the carriers go out on their trips, whatever their importance, must lie in the office till the next trip. After the close of the deliveries for the day carriers' letters must lie over till the next morning delivery, which delay, in many instances, fails to meet the wants of the writer or the object of the communication. Out of this want of a more speedy delivery have grown up in several of the large cities private enterprises, which are now conducted in competition with this service and are diverting from the legitimate revenues of the Department thousands of dollars yearly.

Mr. Chairman, that is all we have, absolutely all, touching the question of necessity or of economy; and when we look a little further to the discussion of the question of interfering with the revenues of the people of this country, let us see whether the people have been injured. On the next page, in considering the subject of the reduction of postage on local letters, we find:

Reports made by inspectors of the Department in their investigation of the unlawful dispatch companies, which have been doing business in New York for many years, show that the Department is losing thousands of dollars annually by the competition of these companies. It is true that the courts have decided the business being carried on by these companies to be illegal, and writs are now pending in the United States court against a number of such companies. The argument advanced by the proprietors of the private dispatch companies and some of their patrons that they give a better service than the Department is able to give us is not borne out by the facts. The private companies make but from two to three deliveries a day, while in one portion of New York city the Department makes nine deliveries, and in many parts of the city five, and in no portion of the city less than three deliveries per day. The only thing—that can be gained by the patrons of the private dispatch companies is the saving of money, these companies charging but 1 cent, while the Government charges 2 cents local postage.

And I ask the committee to mark it well—

Will you take the position, to get hold of these revenues, of arguing that these companies shall be driven out of existence when the Postmaster-General declares that they are delivering the mails at one-half the price the Government itself charges?

Now, sir, I say that we have no information, no estimates, upon which we can act. The gentleman who seems to be the special advocate of this bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER], introduced it on December 11, before any of the committees had been created. We met after the holiday adjournment on the 7th January. This bill on the 16th was reported back to the House. And this extract from the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General is all we have to act upon. I ask if it comports with the public interests that we should take this subject up with so little of the information necessary to enable us to determine intelligently upon a measure of this importance?

As the gentleman from Connecticut sitting near me [Mr. EATON] suggests, where is the Postmaster-General all this while, when it is his duty to make recommendations upon this subject? It is not the duty of the First Assistant Postmaster-General to make such a recommendation, or if he does it should simply go to the Postmaster-General himself.

These gentlemen, in the matter of estimates, have told you further that this experiment will pay, that it will not cost the Government any thing. Yet not one of them will undertake to tell you what will be the extent of the privilege, and how many cities it is to operate in. There are now, and I state this on the authority of the report of the Postmaster-General himself—there are now only fourteen offices where the local postage exceeds the cost of the free-delivery service. How many cities is this service to go into? Is it going simply to those cities? A gentleman on the other side of the House a few minutes ago complained we had not this service here in this city. What is to be the rule? Where is it to go? Is it to be confined to a few cities?

The city of New York has no right to complain. From this report it appears that that city is having nine deliveries of mail a day. The gentlemen who report this bill tell you, as a matter of cost, they do not propose to allow more than $15 a month to be paid to the persons who deliver the extra-stamped letters. And one of the gentlemen tells you that when they fixed it at this sum they did not calculate on getting men to do the work, but proposed to pick up little boys and give them charge of the delivery of these letters all over the city—these important letters, which have to be delivered instantly upon their receipt, because of their importance. You propose that this most important service shall be confined to those little boys, so far as regards the delivery.

I say, sir, such service as that will not be accepted by the business interests of the country; it will be repelled by the common sense of the country. And for one, if I had no other reason for opposing this bill, I would consider it a sufficient reason that these gentlemen propose to do this identical thing.

I trust, therefore, we are not at this time to pass this bill. I think, as the Postmaster-General himself says in discussing the matter of drop-letters, where he antagonizes the First Assistant, we may well reserve this suggestion for future consideration. The Postmaster-General says in his report:

It would seem to be prudent to wait until the deficiency—

Arising from the reduction of postage—

shall have been recovered, or at least more definitely ascertained, before making a further inroad upon the revenues through a reduction of the present rates of postage. The carrying of the mails should not be looked to as a source of revenue, but the service should be rendered as nearly self-sustaining as possible.

That is all the Postmaster-General says on this question. He says substantially, "You have taken a large step in reducing the postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, and my suggestion is to stand still till you see the effect of this reduction."

I trust the committee will heed the suggestions of the Department, and that especially this side of the House, which has for so many years declared itself in favor of economical expenditures, will see to it we shall not rapidly, as soon as we have assembled, before committees have had time for deliberate action, without recommendation from any Department, adopt measures of this sort which are to cost we know not what.

Mr. CHACE. I have listened with considerable care to the arguments adverse to this bill. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that no argument has been advanced here that will not apply adversely to the existence of the Post-Office itself.

Gentlemen say this is making this Government a paternal government because you are giving to it private business. It might as well be said that carrying mails, delivering letters, is private business. Gentlemen say, again, this will cost more than the Department will collect for it. Why, sir, upon that ground you would have to set aside three-fourths of all the post-offices of this country.

Gentlemen say this is increasing the patronage of the Government. Every new post-office you establish increases the patronage of the Government.

This is a question whether we will avail ourselves of every possible agency to improve the methods of delivery, to facilitate intercommunication, to provide the means for the circulation of intelligence. That is the whole question in a nutshell. Our Government, great as it is, is the cheapest government among all the great nations of the earth. And it is the most liberal. But if we are to pursue the policy of gentlemen opposed to this bill we must go back step by step till we have relapsed into a state of almost barbarism.

Mr. KEIFER. I have been classed from what I have said as being opposed to this bill. The general principle and policy I am not so much opposed to as I am to its very loosely guarded character in details. There are a great many objections, that have not at all been stated, to the bill. Gentlemen talk about going into opposition to or driving out, by means of this system, private parties who are engaged in delivering letters. They say people desire to have this delivery in the cities; and they propose that the Government, as a business proposition, shall charge 12 cents on each letter, while the private parties have been long engaged in delivering them at 10. I suppose they will next ask for the legislative power of the Government to exclude the private parties from delivering these messages at a lower rate than the Government is doing under the postal system. I suppose we have the power to do that.

Now, I do not subscribe fully to the doctrine expressed by the gentleman from New York, who says that because certain private parties are making a large sum of money out of the business of delivering letters the United States Government ought necessarily to go into the business.

Then I suppose it is to be the policy of the Government, wherever you find that private parties have built up a business and an occupation, built it up before the Government had the foresight, either through its Legislature or otherwise, to undertake such business—you are then to seize upon it and overthrow the parties engaged in it and take it for the benefit of the Government. That rule as a general policy will not do. While I admit it is a prime duty of the Government to deliver all mail matter and with due promptness, I do not think any such principle as that should prevail.

Let me refer to another thing to show the loose manner in which this bill has been drawn. By the very terms of the bill, every letter that may go to a free-delivery office, having upon it this extra 10-cent stamp, must be delivered to any person within the bound of the delivery of that office, although he may live ten or fifteen miles from the office.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman if he knows of any post-office in the United States, excepting perhaps New York city, which has subpost-offices all over it, where the limit is ten or fifteen miles?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman asks a question that has no sort of application to my statement. I say that the limit of free-delivery offices in many cases is ten or fifteen miles. Some of the patrons of the post-office in the town in which I reside live more than that distance from the office. According to the loose terms of this bill all the patrons of all free-delivery offices are to have their letters delivered immediately up to the hour of midnight.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Allow me again——

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman misunderstands the question. This bill is not drawn so as to provide that these letters shall be delivered to those who are entitled to the benefit of the free-delivery system. The gentleman who drafted the bill did not use language that would require that. These letters are to be delivered to all persons who receive mails at a free-delivery office; they are to be entitled to have delivered immediately such letters as are here indicated, although they may live a long distance in the country. I do not suppose the committee intended that, but that is the plain language of the bill.

Now, I may be brought to a point where I can vote for this bill if its advocates will place it upon a business basis, but as it stands now it is full of objections. It is only a signal for the Government to start upon a project that will fail.

If we are to have this at all, I would suggest that where a letter is a drop-letter there should be required only a 10-cent stamp upon it, so that the Government may deliver that letter as cheaply as it can be done under the messenger system. Then in the city of New York, or Philadelphia, or in any city having the free-delivery system, persons putting letters in the office to be delivered within the bounds of that office should not have to pay more than 10 cents. If that is done, you can then fairly compete with and drive out these private enterprises.

I would suggest that change at least, and some others. I am not prepared to say that we can require messengers to deliver these letters to be employed from 7 o'clock in the morning until 12 o'clock at midnight for $15 a month. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] and others say that we have boys here to deliver our messages. True, but we pay them from sixty to seventy-five dollars a month to run about the floor here and deliver our messages.

It is proposed by this bill to select boys to travel through the streets and alleys at late hours at night and to take receipts for important messages and to be paid the enormous sum of $15 a month. We should put the pay high enough to be at least fair to the class of persons who are to be required to perform this duty in all kinds of weather and at all hours.

If the bill shall be amended and put in proper shape I am willing that the Department may try the experiment, as it seems desirous to undertake this duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reporting this bill, have suggested certain amendments. If no further general debate is desired the bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I have promised the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] five minutes of my time.

Mr. PETTIBONE. He can get that in the five-minute debate.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I understand the gentleman can get the time he desires under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know whether the Chair can hear anything, but we can not hear anything that is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by sections for consideration and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a special stamp of a face valuation of — cents shall be provided and issued, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the stamp required to be placed thereon to prepay the drop-letter rate of postage, or the rate required on letters mailed, and whose final delivery is to be at a free-delivery office, shall be regarded as entitling such letters to immediate delivery.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads recommend that the section be amended by filling the blank before the word "cents" with the word "ten," and after the word "cents" strike out "shall" and insert "may;" so that it will read:

That a special stamp of a face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to offer an amendment, to some extent an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee. It is to insert after the word "cents," in line 3, the words "whenever deemed advisable;" so that it will read:

That a special stamp of a face valuation of 10 cents, whenever deemed advisable, may be provided and issued, &c.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. That is all right.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, the excitable and distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has taken occasion to assail me on the floor of this House——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentlemon is mistaken if he thinks I intended to assail him.

Mr. BELFORD. Because I had the honor to allude to the honest miners who have built up the Western States. I expect before this session of Congress is over that we shall see strange spectacles here. We shall see the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] posing as an economist; and we shall see the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] posing as the great objector; because they are rival candidates for the Presidential nomination next fall.

I do not know exactly what attitude or position my friend from Illinois will occupy when that time comes; but I desire to say to him that it was the miner in 1859 who blazed a pathway for the march of empire, and then enlarged it into a highway by which the commerce of the East is drifting to the West and by which the wealth of the West is coming to the East. It was in 1859 that the fires on the top of the Rocky Mountains were built in Colorado; and this year we have produced in silver alone over $26,000,000. Talk about "tallow dips!" The gentleman used to be a page in this House, and from that he has grown up to be a member of this council of the nation. What right has he to reflect upon honest men who build their cabins upon the tops of the mountains, who dig into the bowels of the earth, and who contribute to your Treasury over $26,000,000 yearly. The gentleman was out in that country; probably he was not successful in his mining operations [laughter]; probably because he did not happen to fall into the hands of honest men dealing honestly. But I do not believe he found a citizen of Colorado connected with any mine who ever cheated him out of one penny. God bless the honest miners! They have made that Western country to blossom and bloom. They have opened up the very bowels of the mountains. They have led the way for the construction of railroads, the building of churches and school-houses and towns, while the gentleman had not the courage to cross the plains except in a Pullman palace car. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that no other gentleman who heard me to-day will say that I uttered a single word which could be construed as in the slightest degree a reflection upon the gentleman from Colorado or upon any citizen of Colorado, be he miner, lawyer, or anything else. I simply alluded to a figure that he himself had used; but I used it no more by way of criticism or reflection than did the gentleman himself. Hence there was no occasion for the gentleman to repeat a speech that I have heard him deliver on this floor every session since I have been a member with him. I have heard him tell in past Congresses how in years agone there were men in Colorado who had blazed a way for the path of empire. I have got that speech by heart.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain none but the kindest feelings toward the gentleman. I desire to disclaim any intention to reflect upon him or the people of his State. But as he has intimated that I may have had some speculations in his State, I will venture the assertion (without referring at all to any of my experiences or admitting that I have had any in that direction) that if my friend will go upon the prairies of Illinois or elsewhere in this country and ask those who have invested in his State what has become of their investments among the "honest miners" of Colorado, he will learn that in nine cases out of ten they have put down ten dollars where they have taken up ten cents. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to my amendment. I have offered it simply for the purpose of giving the Postmaster-General the discretion to establish this delivery system in cities where he may deem it advisable. When the amendment has been voted on, I shall offer a proviso at the end of the section limiting the service to those cities only where it shall be found to be self-sustaining.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 91, noes 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order now.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill? If it be in order, I make that motion.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I presume that motion is not in order until the bill has been perfected by amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion properly stated would be that the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

Mr. BLAND. I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion, under the rules, takes precedence of the motion to amend.

Mr. BINGHAM. I had not thought, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLAND. Is this debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the Chair rule it is not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule on the subject.

Mr. KEIFER. It has been ruled to be debatable in several instances during the past two or three Congresses.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been held that the motion to strike out the enacting clause in the Committee of the Whole stands upon the same footing as the motion to lay upon the table in the House, which is not debatable. That was the old rule and the old practice.

Mr. BLAND. The motion to strike out the enacting clause should be decided without debate in accordance with the practice of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has referred to the former decisions on this point, and finds debate has been allowed on the motion to strike out the enacting clause. He will therefore recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought, as one of the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, there would be any question here as to the propriety and wisdom of this legislation. It was a bill fairly discussed in that committee and had met with the approval of the officials of the letter-carrier division of the Post-Office Department.

So far as the drawing and wording of the bill go, if any words of qualification are needed to confine the delivery to the free-delivery offices, there can be no question in my mind as to the wisdom of their insertion.

I desire, however, to answer several statements made in this debate. One was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], that the Postmaster-General had not made this recommendation. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that past legislation has been had without favorable recommendations on the part of the Postmaster-General and upon the counter recommendations made by his Assistant Postmaster-General and upon the counter recommendations of the President. You know that in reference to the reduction of postage to 2 cents the Postmaster-General made no recommendation. It was the President who recommended the reduction of postage to 2 cents. And on the telegraph question the Postmaster-General has declined to make any recommendations to the effect that all telegraphic communication should be under the Government. The President in his annual message has made a protest against it. Therefore I arose to answer the gentleman from Georgia, because the First Assistant Postmaster-General and the Postmaster-General differ on this question is no reason why the judgment of the House should be counter to the proposed legislation.

Mr. BLAND. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield only on the condition it is not to be taken out of my time.

In reply to the gentleman's criticism about trusting the mails to boys of 15 or 16 years of age, I wish to say that now in most of the large cities the most important communications which go by the messenger service are intrusted to boys from 10 to 15 years of age, and they traverse the city in every direction, not only during the day but during the night. At any hour of the night you can get a messenger boy to go to any section of the city. Those boys receive a compensation of $3 or $4 a week.

Now, one word more. You have to-day in your postal service a register system. If I desire to transmit to any portion of the country a package containing valuables or papers of importance I will send it through the registered mail. How will I send it? I have to put on a special stamp of 10 cents to meet that additional protection afforded by the Government. If I desire to transmit money from one sction to another I go and get a money-order and pay for it, and by a system of debits and credits in the post-office system the one to whom I send it is able to go and collect it at the place where he resides. And this bill provides for precisely a similar special stamp. If I desire to communicate with a correspondent in Philadelphia and feel that my letter may reach there after the hour for delivery of letters, I may, by the payment myself, not to come out of the Treasury but out of my own pocket, for a special stamp, and by placing that stamp on the letter, have it delivered up to 12 o'clock at night. It is the same in principle as the registered letter. I have to put on a special stamp. So, too, I have to pay extra when I wish to transmit money through the money-order service. If I put a special stamp on my letter under this bill it will be immediately delivered by special messenger, although the regular hour has passed for the delivery of letters.

That will take nothing from your surplus revenues, and I venture the suggestion that in a very short time your service will be a paying service. Standing to the credit of the letter-carrier service to-day in the Post-Office Department is over a million of dollars surplus for the last fiscal year, and every estimate signifies the further assurance that this year it may run from $1,700,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, you have to commence this service of special delivery of important letters just as you commenced the delivery under the letter-carrier system, the same as you commenced the registered-letter system, and the system under which you established the money-order service, every one of which, as branches or additions to the Post-Office Department, to-day return a revenue to the Government, and which the gentleman refers to as a surplus.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee in further discussing the merits of this bill. I had supposed some time since that the subject was debated until it was fully understood by the committee, all the merit there was in it, if any.

The third section of the bill in my opinion contains the meat and all that there is in the whole measure. That provides for the employment of as many "parties" as may be deemed necessary by those in authority to perform this service. Who is to judge of the necessity of this number to be paid at the rate of $15 per month, and who will perform the service for $15 per month? It was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio that it would be necessary to increase that amount if the service is ever performed at all. But, sir, in the approaching election we can understand that a great many employés may be necessary under the provisions of this bill, and notwithstanding your civil service commission and laws, it may be found necessary in certain quarters to have quite a percentage of these employés for the purpose of carrying that election. This bill then, in my judgment, is simply a measure to increase the number of employés in this Government, when in fact they could be decreased in number, and when these cities already have ample facilities for the delivery of their local mail. It is unnecessary, therefore, at this time to go to further expense, increasing the employés of the Post-Office Department, and diverting the revenues of the Government for other purposes, and especially in consideration of the fact that we have reduced the postage on all letters from 3 cents to 2 cents, and there will be thereby created a deficiency, I have no doubt, in the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the current year.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care to employ half that amount of time. I wish to make a single remark in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] who has just taken his seat. He commends this bill to the committee by a plausible statement that he, in Washington, if he wants to send a letter to Philadelphia and to insure its delivery after the regular delivery of the mails has closed for that day, has simply to pay an additional sum of 10 cents out of his own pocket, and not, as he claims, out of the Treasury of this Government. The statement made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, to which I have before alluded, showing that the private companies are doing that very work cheaper than the Government can do it, in connection with the arguments which have been used in favor of this measure on this floor to-day, show to my mind that this is only an effort to stop it and to get hold of the revenues that flow from that class of business. That is the only argument that there is in it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Georgia understands that I can not through a private company send my letter from here to Philadelphia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman should state the argument clearly. I referred to the business as carried on only in the larger cities.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Furthermore the gentleman says, in the course of his argument, that I have argued that because the First Assistant Postmaster-General had recommended one thing and there had been a failure on the part of the Department to recommend another, it does not follow that it is wrong. I made no such argument; but the gentlemen favoring the bill themselves have argued that because the First Assistant Postmaster-General had recommended it, and that because his report is embodied in the report of the Postmaster-General, therefore it comes before Congress with the indorsement of the Postmaster-General and his recommendation. I say that that does not follow by any means. It does not follow that the Postmaster-General (because it is embodied in his report) must be understood as indorsing or recommending it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out the enacting clause.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 92.

Mr. REAGAN, Mr. BLAND, and others demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. BINGHAM were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 105.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1071) to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters at free-delivery offices, and a special stamp to insure said delivery, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House agree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York, and Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to non-concur, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson;

A bill (S. 47) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased;

A bill (S. 297) for the relief of Mrs. S. A. Wright and Mrs. C. Fahnestock;

A bill (S. 298) for the relief of Margaret Cassidy; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 26) granting permission to Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the royal and imperial order of Francis Joseph from the Government of Austria.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 24, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. ELIAS DE WITT HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico submitting an estimate for needed repairs of the legislative halls and committee-rooms in the Adobe Palace at Santa Fé, in that Territory; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 163) providing for the appointment of clerks of the circuit and district courts in the southern district of Georgia;

A bill (H. R. 2824) to amend sections 4, 5, and 9 of an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places for holding courts in said districts," and to provide for holding terms of the court of the western judicial district of Texas at the city of El Paso, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to create an additional United States judicial district and to establish circuit and district courts therein, in the State of Alabama.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Frederick H. Wales and 15 others, citizens of Tulare City, Cal., praying for the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplemental thereto, now embodied in sections 769, 1864, 2217, 2244, 2613, and 3830 of the Revised Statutes, by which the constitutional term of many administrative officers was changed and fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CONGER presented the petition of John Q. Adams and others, citizens of Negaunee, Mich., praying for the passage of the bill to quiet the titles to certain lands in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of the executive committee on behalf of the national convention of colored citizens of the United States, held at Louisville, Ky., September 24, 1883, praying for an amendment to the Constitution and such legislation as will protect citizens in their civil rights; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition signed by W. A. Pledger, chairman, and Jesse Lawson, secretary, for the committee appointed by the colored national convention held at Louisville, Ky., September 24, 1883, praying that provision be made for the due execution of the laws for the protection of the colored people of the United States, and for such additional laws as Congress may think proper for that purpose. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of G. H. Wilkinson and others, citizens of Saint Louis County, Missouri, praying for national aid to the common schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CULLOM. I present the petition of John McNellis, of Grundy County, Illinois, praying for the refunding of internal-revenue taxes. I move that the petition and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Finance, to which has been referred a bill on the same subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I present the memorial of Charles G. Lundborg, formerly of the royal Swedish navy, relating to his inventions and improvements in steamships. As it is a memorial setting forth some important facts, I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON presented a petition of letter-carriers of Charleston, S. C., praying that they be allowed a leave of absence for thirty days in each year without loss of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Dalrymple, Bard & Co. and others, citizens of Port Allegheny, Pa., praying for a tobacco-rebate appropriation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a petition of Jay Gould Post, No. 145, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, praying that pensions be granted to all those who served in the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. Yesterday the House joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, was sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, quite naturally, as other papers relating to that subject-matter had gone to that committee. I was not present at the time. Knowing what I did of the measure, that it was an appropriation bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations in the other House and sent here as such, I should have asked that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations instead of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in order to save time and because such bills commonly go that way.

It was, however, as I have said, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and this morning that committee considered it, having before it the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; and in view of the necessity for immediate action upon this subject-matter, so that if any expedition is sent out to relieve the men who have been there in northern cold and darkness for two years and more it may be done at once, the committee has directed me to report the joint resolution back, with the further direction that I take the suggestion and counsel of the chairman or any other members of the Committee on Appropriations as to the advisability of sending it to the Committee on Appropriations now, thereby making some little delay, or passing it at present.

I may only say here (the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is present and listening to me) that it is very important that whatever is done in this case be done at once. If an expedition be fitted out, it ought to start from New York at no later day than the 1st of May. It ought to be at Upernavik by the 15th or 20th in order to enter upon what must be the final search for Lieutenant Greely and his party, for since the earlier part of 1881 no sound or token or sign has come from that party. Everything that has been sent out has failed. The objects in view in the last expedition of establishing a relief station at Littleton Island failed entirely, and there is the greatest danger that with the early summer, even if it has not taken place already, the party may have been scattered, not finding relief, so that every hour, I may say, is important.

Mr. ALLISON. I was present yesterday when the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs by the presiding officer. I see no special reason why it should now be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I think every member of the Senate is perfectly familiar with the situation of Lieutenant Greely and his party. I suppose there is no doubt of the necessity of an appropriation, and, for myself, I am perfectly willing that it shall be now reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state, with the permission of the Senate, that the Chair referred the joint resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs without having read it in extenso, under the impression that the chief point in the measure was not so much the appropriation of money, which was of course necessary, as the methods to be provided for sending out an expedition. The Chair, therefore, thought the Committee on Naval Affairs was the appropriate committee to consider it at first, at least.

Mr. HALE. I have said that I considered the reference quite natural. I will, then, under these circumstances, report, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the joint resolution, and under the peculiar and pressing conditions surrounding the subject-matter I ask that it may be considered now. I think it will take but very little time, and every day, as I have said, is precious.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to prepare and dispatch an expedition to the coast of Greenland, Smith's Sound, or Lady Franklin Bay for the purpose of relieving and bringing home Lieut. A. W. Greely and party; and that for this purpose the purchase of not exceeding three vessels is authorized, and all expenditures necessary for manning, equipping, and supplying them, and for any land journeys which may be required; and such sums as may be necessary to effect the object of this resolution are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the vessels purchased to be sold after their return, and the money arising from such sale covered into the Treasury. And the President shall submit to Congress, on the first Monday of December, 1884, a full and detailed account of all expenditures and outlays made on account of this appropriation.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the joint resolution state what the amount of the appropriation is to be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; "such sums as may be necessary" is the phrase used.

Mr. HALE. The joint resolution does not name a specific amount for the reason that the service required is of that kind that it can not be told precisely how these vessels shall be fitted, where they shall be obtained. Everything, I will say to the Senator from Kansas, is done under stress of weather. It is a House appropriation measure, reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. When the same question was very fittingly asked there that has been asked by the Senator from Kansas, if the Senator will look at the record of the debate he will see that it was stated, as I state here now, that it is impossible to fix the amount that will be required; and it was thought in view of the purchase of some vessels that will be required for this purpose it would be better not to state any sum, however large, as a limit, but that all that could be safely left to the President.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator state what the probable expense will be?

Mr. HALE. No, I can not. This, all Senators must bear in mind, is the last expedition that can be sent. Unless Lieutenant Greely and his party are found this summer, they will doubtless pass away and we shall never hear more of them.

Mr. VEST. I could not catch the words of the Senator from Maine exactly. Does he say that this is the last expedition that will be sent to the North Pole or the last that will be sent to rescue the Greely expedition?

Mr. HALE. I was speaking directly upon the expedition for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party. The circumstances are such that I believe that if this does not succeed, everything relating to that party will be looked upon as hopeless and they must needs be abandoned.

As to the further question suggested by the Senator from Missouri, whether any more expeditions will be sent for adventures and scientific and semi-scientific purposes to the northern regions, I believe fully that this will be the last; that we shall never have for years to come any more of them. There is no disposition on the part of the War or Navy Department, I think, to send any more expeditions.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, whatever secrets are secluded in that mysterious region that surrounds the North Pole, they are guarded by nature with the most zealous solicitude. The results of the disposition of man to penetrate every mystery upon the surface of this planet has been one uninterrupted succession of failures and disasters. Expedition after expedition has followed into that dangerous and tempting region with simply one result, and that is an absolute failure to discover any of the mysteries that are alleged there to exist, and with a loss of life that is appalling to contemplate.

It appears to me that the principle recognized in the joint resolution is one of very great danger and of doubtful propriety. I suppose no one will deny that under the provisions of the joint resolution if the Secretary of the Navy sees fit to expend $10,000,000 we shall be compelled to make the appropriation necessary to pay it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It ought to be amended.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Missouri says it ought to be amended. I think it ought to be amended.

The Senator from Maine says that it is impossible to impose any limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy that will not impair the efficiency of the measures that are called for by this humane and benevolent enterprise. I am unwilling as one member of this body to commit Congress to the declaration that any amount of money that may be thought necessary shall be spent by the executive officer of that Department without limitation upon an errand that is understood in advance to be fruitless and hopeless.

I should be very glad if there might be an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate and of both Houses of Congress that it is the belief of those who have charge of the finances and of the resources of this country that these expeditions should cease, and that if there are any adventurous spirits who desire to tempt the mysteries and dangers of that region hereafter, they shall do so at their peril. I do not think that humanity requires us to send men from the Navy or to permit volunteers to be allowed to go there year after year to know that the only result will be disaster and death.

Mr. HALE. There is no desire for secrecy with reference to this appropriation on the part of either of the Departments that have been intrusted with this search. If this joint resolution had been originally framed with a limitation I do not know that any serious mischief would have resulted; but it was considered, so imminent was the pressure, purchases of vessels needing to be made, an impossibility to tell what would be asked by owners of vessels required for this service if they knew the Government needs and knew the amount of money appropriated—all of those things considered, it was thought better not to limit or fix any sum. There is no danger of its ever going into any domain of extravagance that would be alarming.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me one interrogatory?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask him, when he speaks about the expenditure that may be incurred, what guarantee there is that this expedition, disappearing in that profound abyss, not being heard of for two years, it may be, after they departed, is not to be followed by others upon which the same vast expenditure is to be entailed?

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that I for one am prepared to meet that emergency. Here are these men confined in those northern regions, as I have said, with no sound or sign coming from them. It is a question whether the American Congress will abandon them now or seek once more to relieve them.

It is a wonderful story, the story of this Greely expedition, sent up there in the early part of the year 1881 for the purpose of making explorations and examinations for certain effects in science, and establishing or trying to establish meteorological results and stations, left there by the ship which took them, with abundant supplies to last for two years or more, at Lady Franklin Bay, with imperative orders on September, 1883, to come south as far as Littleton Island, at the mouth of Smith's Sound, and there await communication from the United States. From that day to this nothing has been heard from that little band. In 1882 an expedition was sent up to communicate with them, in the Neptune, which failed entirely of its purpose, blocked by ice as it was, finding the waters entirely different from what Lieutenant Greely did when he went up in 1881, for he had an almost clear passage up to Lady Franklin Bay. In 1882 another expedition was fitted out. The Proteus, the ship that had originally taken Lieutenant Greely and his party, was sent up amply supplied with provisions for a long time for the crew and for the relief of the Greely party, with instructions to establish a relief station at Littleton Island, in Smith's Sound; but the water was so clear that the commander of that expedition disregarded those instructions and pushed on for Lady Franklin Bay, hoping to meet and pick up the Greely party. Unfortunately, soon afterward he got into ice, the vessel was crushed and destroyed, with all its store of precious provisions sent there for the Greely party, and the crew of the Proteus, scattered and drifting in different directions, struck out in open boats, and at last, worn out almost, landed at Upernavik, on the coast, some hundreds of miles below.

The result is that Lieutenant Greely stands to-day under the orders left with him at the time when he was left there to come south in the late summer or early fall of 1883, fully expecting to find a relief station established at Littleton Island, where he would remain till succor reached him, if there succor can reach him; but owing to the failure of the Proteus there is little or nothing there; and what is the fate of that party, what has become of them, no man can conjecture. Whether they came out, and, finding no relief and no provisions, attempted to retrace their steps to Lady Franklin Bay, where they have provisions, or whether they scattered and attempted to get to the shore farther south, or whether they have been overcome by the rigors of the winter there and have ceased to be, no man can tell.

But while that uncertainty exists, and while there is a prospect, small or great, of relieving that party that we sent up there, I for one am not prepared to consume time in considering the question or to delay by considering the expenditure of money.

I will say further, in answer to the Senator from Kansas, that while I do not believe any more scientific or semi-scientific expeditions will be sent up there, that should it happen that the expedition we send now is crushed in the ice, and a doubt arises whether the men that we send now are there needing relief, I should then believe it was the duty of the American Congress to appropriate the money necessary to bring them back. Until it is established, so far as anything can be established about these expeditions, that the effort is hopeless and that the brave volunteers have gone and are dead and it is useless for us to attempt succor, I would be in favor of attempting it; but that is a question of the future; we are not confronted with it now. We are confronted with the other necessity of at once doing something for these men.

Now, as to the details—it is very proper that they should be explained—the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in a letter which is in the documents that go with this resolution, dated January 17, 1884, go into this whole subject-matter. They declare that the board which they provided for has reported to them and they indorse its report, and the opinion of the board is that the relief expedition should have such an equipment that in any event it will be able to reach Lady Franklin Bay, and that it should consist of at least two vessels, each having supplies for a period of two years, not only for its own crew but for the crew of the other vessel and for the men composing Lieutenant Greely's party at Lady Franklin Bay.

The board recommends the immediate purchase of two full-powered steam whalers or steam sealers of from 500 to 600 tons displacement, and that these vessels should be thoroughly equipped with boats and sleds.

There are only a few such ships in the world. There is only a small number from which these can be bought. They stand in value ranging from $75,000 to $130,000 or $140,000 each. There is no time to build, because the expedition must start as early as May 1. With this moderate purpose in view of fitting out these two or three vessels at a cost something like what I have stated for each, although I appreciate the force of the point made by the Senator from Kansas and should be ordinarily the first to stand in indorsement of that point, I do not think here that we ought to delay or to send this resolution back amended to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Maine to the language of the joint resolution. The Senator from Kansas makes the point that this money is to be expended by the Secretary of the Navy. I do not so understand the joint resolution. The money is to be expended under the direction of the President. It says so in terms.

Mr. HALE. It has been heretofore a joint affair of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. BUTLER. It reads:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to prepare and dispatch an expedition to the coast of Greenland, Smith's Sound, or Lady Franklin Bay for the purpose of relieving and bringing home Lieut. A. W. Greely and party; and that for this purpose the purchase of not exceeding three vessels is authorized, and all expenditures necessary for manning, equipping, and supplying them, and for any land journeys which may be required.

Further on it says:

And the President shall submit to Congress on the first Monday of December, 1884, a full and detailed account of all expenditures and outlays made on account of this appropriation.

The entire appropriation, as I understand, is to be expended under the immediate direction of the President.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER. And it seems to me that we can trust the President of the United States in a matter of this kind when we consider the exigencies that are surrounding the Greely party, now isolated. Therefore upon the Committee on Naval Affairs I gave my assent to this resolution without any hesitation.

Mr. HALE. With the exception of the limitation in amount suggested by the Senator from Kansas, the joint resolution is as carefully guarded as it can be. Whatever comes back of stores or of these ships is to be sold at once and turned into the Treasury. I may say here that the expenses can not be enormous under any circumstances.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask my colleague a question in relation to to this matter. He speaks of the difficulty of finding vessels suitable for these voyages, and I do not think he underrates the difficulty at all. I desire to ask him whether or not the committee considered at all the question of building two or three vessels?

Mr. HALE. That question was asked the Secretaries, and the answer was that that was carefully considered, and it was hoped that it might be safe to provide for the construction of those ships here at our own shores, in our own yards, and get them out in time; but considering the necessity of starting the expedition at so early a date, it was at last concluded that that would not be by any means safe, and that ships already built must be purchased. I do not think myself it would be safe. I should be very glad to see one or two of these vessels built in my own State, as I know my colleague would, but I do not think it would be safe.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to say to the Senator that there is in his own State one ship-yard which could build all three in sixty days from the time the specifications were made and the contract entered into.

Mr. HALE. But if any accident should take place at the last and they should fail, then we should be entirely without ships and the season would be gone and the party dead. That is the trouble, Mr. President

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I move to amend, by inserting after the word "necessary," in line 11, the words "not exceeding one million dollars."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be adopted; first, because it will send the resolution back to the House and make a delay; and secondly, because the sum put in there is very much larger than either Secretary contemplates that this will cost, probably more than double; and under the conditions I do not think it is necessary to make the limitation. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine what amount was appropriated for the last expedition, that proved a failure?

Mr. HALE. I think it was thirty-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. Thirty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, then, to strike out of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas the words "one million" and insert "one hundred thousand."

Mr. HALE. That would be utterly inadequate to dispatch the expedition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Kansas moves to limit this appropriation to $1,000,000. The Senator from Missouri moves to amend that amendment by limiting the appropriation to $100,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. If $100,000 will not do I should like the Senator to give us some idea as to whether $150,000 will do, or $200,000. Let us know something about what we are appropriating.

Mr. HALE. I do not think either $150,000 or $200,000 will do.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, will $250,000 do?

Mr. HALE. I do not think so. I do not know but that there may be something like a half million dollars expended before we get through.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I withdraw my amendment of $100,000 and move to put in $500,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas by striking out the words "one million" in the amendment and inserting the words "five hundred thousand." The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no idea that it will take $500,000, but the objection I have to designating that amount is that it is an invitation to expend that amount of money, when perhaps if it is left to the discretion of the President not more than $400,000 might be expended, or perhaps $350,000, or perhaps $450,000. Therefore it seems to me to be not wise to put in any limitation whatever, in view of all the circumstances surrounding this appropriation. I should prefer to see the joint resolution passed as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. I think we shall get these vessels a great deal cheaper if we do not put in a limit of $500,000 than we shall if we put in that limit. I do not think economy, a real limitation of the expenditure of money on this matter, will be reached by putting in the limit of half a million dollars. If we put that in the expense will be likely to go to it by the price of the vessels being raised. But that is for the Senate to choose. If it thinks it is advisable to put that limitation in, I think it is money enough.

Mr. FRYE. I am not going to move an amendment to this resolution; neither do I wish to criticise it to any extent; but I presume that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy can not find to-day a half-dozen whaling steamers or seal steamers carrying the United States flag that can be purchased for this purpose, and I do not know that they can find any fit vessels suitable for a successful voyage into these waters carrying the provisions and coal necessary.

Mr. HALE. They believe that they can. They have been investigating and searching, and have vessels now in mind—I would not like to state what they are because that would make it public—but they have been investigating, and believe that they can purchase.

Mr. FRYE. I believe if authority were given to purchase or to build, this expedition would cost a good many thousand dollars less than it will now. As to the building there is not the slightest difficulty on the face of the earth in doing it. There are a dozen ship-yards in the United States that would build all three vessels in sixty days after the contract was entered into.

Mr. HALE. They could do it if everything favored, but it is not a question for us to decide how that is to be done; the Departments have taken that upon themselves. Suppose contracts were made for the delivery of these ships all completed on the last day of April, and suppose anything should happen in the last two weeks or the last four weeks, as if a fire were to break out or there should be some failure to perform the contract, all would be gone. In view of that exigency neither the Departments nor I decide that these ships can not be built in Maine's ship-yards, for I agree fully with my colleague and I should like to see them built there, but both Secretaries concluded that it was not safe to run that risk.

Mr. FRYE. I do not believe in the risk. There is no more risk of accidents happening in the building of these vessels than there is of accidents in the purchase of the two or three vessels they can select under this resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think we are bound in honor to make whatever appropriation is necessary to rescue Greely and his comrades. Their expedition was sent out in 1880 in pursuance of an act of Congress which was passed on the 1st day of May, 1880, by which the expedition was directed to Lady Franklin Bay. That measure came into this body by a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it was contemplated at the time that the expedition would last for three years, and when Lieutenant Greely went out there he went out with that purpose in view. In 1881 and 1882 appropriations were made for this purpose. Last year on investigation of the subject the Committee on Appropriations decided that this expedition should be brought home, it having first been sent out under the direction of the Signal Service Bureau.

Mr. HALE. That was put into the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. That was put into the appropriation bill of last year. An appropriation of $33,000 was made for the purpose of bringing this party home, and the Proteus, I believe, was sent out for that purpose, and was wrecked on the way. Now I think we are bound to make such appropriation and to provide such an expedition as will, if possible, secure the return of Lieutenant Greely and his comrades, and when that is done I think our duty ends. I am glad to see that this joint resolution is an appropriation for the purpose of bringing them home, and not continuing these explorations and scientific examinations at Lady Franklin Bay. My own impression is that the amount of expenditure will reach nearly a half million dollars if the plan be carried out as suggested by the naval board. As I believe, this whole bill is in accordance with the recommendation made by the naval board.

Although it seems to be well guarded, giving the President discretion and requiring him to report in detail the amount expended under this expedition, yet I can see no great harm in limiting the amount to half a million dollars, if the Senate think that is a wise thing to do. I have no doubt it will cost very nearly that sum, and I think we ought not to appropriate a less sum than half a million; and yet, whether the sum is limited or not, I have no doubt the expenditures will be reasonably and economically made.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the suggestions of the Senator from Iowa recall the circumstances under which these previous expeditions have been sent forward. The testimony that has been taken and the investigations that have been made disclose in my judgment a blundering incapacity and want of comprehension of what was required and a stupidity that amounts almost to imbecility which do not hold out any very brilliant expectations of advantageous results if this expedition is to be continued under the auspices under which the former went forward.

The Senator from Iowa says that this is to be the end. I wish to inquire if in pursuance of the instructions that have hitherto been issued and the measures that have been hitherto adopted and the conflicts that have ensued, the want of harmony that has arisen is to follow this, and the expedition that is here authorized goes into those mysterious regions and is heard of no more, whether we shall not under the same aspect be called upon to appropriate another million or another half million to go in search of these who are now to be sent forward? Sir, it is useless to talk about this being the end of it. I have no doubt that this expedition that goes forward will be subject to exactly the same disasters and the same dangers as those that have preceded it, and I am unwilling in the present aspect of this situation to say that the President or any of his officers shall be allowed the absolute control of any sum of money they see fit to expend for this purpose.

What has hitherto been done does not encourage Congress, it does not excite any very warm anticipations in public opinion that great results will follow the expedition which is here to be authorized; and if the Senators from Missouri think that $500,000 will be sufficient, I am willing that my amendment shall be so modified. One object that I had in view was to ascertain from the Senator from Maine what amount he thought would be necessary, and I submit that the Committee on Naval Affairs were not justified in presenting a measure of this importance to the Senate without some inquiry, without some statistics, without some advice as to what was necessary, and the amount that would be required to render that necessity effectual.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator bear in mind that I stated that I believed the expense of buying these ships at the rates which I mentioned and fitting them out and the cost of the expedition would come somewhere near a half million dollars.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir; I remember that, but that statement was only made after I had offered my amendment. I interrogated the Senator very strictly in advance as to what he thought it would cost, and he said he was unable to give any estimate of what it would cost.

Mr. HALE. I should not want to give an estimate.

Mr. INGALLS. I then offered an amendment that it should not exceed $1,000,000. He said that was too large. The Senator from Missouri then said it might be $100,000. He said that was too small; and between the balancing of opinions we finally obtained from the Senator from Maine the statement that $500,000 would probably be the amount that would be required to render this expedition effectual.

Mr. HALE. And yet I would not pretend to make that as an estimate. I do not think anybody can do that. I do not think the Secretaries can. I believe that that limitation will cover it; but if I were going to make an estimate and look into it carefully, I might find that $100,000 less than that would cover it. I do not think anybody can make an estimate. It is only conjecture on my part that it will not reach over a half million dollars, but I think we are safe in leaving it with the President without limitation.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no hesitation in saying that humanity and patriotism require that an expedition shall be sent forward under proper auspices, reasonably manned and equipped, for the purpose of bringing back the Greely expedition; but I say that it is utterly in defiance of the principles that ought to regulate the expenditure of the public money to vest in the President or in any of his subordinate officers unlimited discretion for any purpose whatever. We are just as competent to decide what is necessary as the President is, and we are the guardians and custodians of the public resources. It is not in accordance with the rules that have always been observed here, it is not in accordance with the suggestion of business or of practical affairs to place in the hands of the President, subject as he may be to pressure from various humanitarian sources, to fit out an expedition that may involve us in an expenditure which, as the Senator himself has admitted, may be more than a million dollars without any limitations or guards whatever.

I therefore hope, sir, that whatever sum, and that shall be the largest sum, that the Senator from Maine or the committee think is requisite will be placed in this bill as the limit beyond which they are not to go.

Mr. HALE. Now let us have this matter, which has occupied so much time, out of the way. It was only by indulgence of the Senate that it came under the morning hour, and I would not have asked it had I supposed so much time would have been taken. I hope we may have a vote now and dispose of the matter.

Mr. BECK. Before the vote is taken I desire to know, as some hundreds of thousands of dollars will be necessary to carry out this purpose, whether the Committee on Naval Affairs has inquired of the Secretary of the Navy, or of the proper authorities, anything in regard to the probable cost, or as to the plan, or as to the manner in which this money is likely to be expended; and, if not, why not? If the committee has made that inquiry, why is not the information before us a good deal more accurate than we have it?

I should like to know also whether there can not be an estimate made, according to the best information the Navy Department now has, as to what this is going to cost us, to be furnished by to-morrow morning, so that somebody will be responsible for the action taken. Why should we be called upon as a matter of philanthropy to be spending money without estimates, without responsibility, and without any cause shown, when all this information can be had, and at least one Department of this Government can make itself responsible to Congress for the call which it now makes? I propose to vote all that is necessary, but no more.

Mr. HALE. Let me say, in answer to the Senator from Kentucky, that the Committee on Naval Affairs inquired fully into all these things. They had the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy before them, and went into the subject fully.

The only thing that is sought here is a limitation in amount. That is the only thing upon which information can not be given closely. Neither the Secretary of War nor the Secretary of the Navy can tell perhaps within $50,000 what this expedition will cost. I can very well see how that is. They do not know, first, what the vessels will cost. That is impossible to be ascertained now, for they have no authority to buy until after an appropriation is made and they are furnished with the money.

It is not the fact that the Committee on Naval Affairs comes here without information. All the papers and documents, and they are quite numerous, are here in my hands or on my desk, and I propose to put them in, or if the Senate requires that more time be taken, they may be read from the desk. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is now I think reading a communication from the two Secretaries jointly, in which they state how this is to be done. There is no desire to make it mysterious in any way. It is only, as I understand it, this question of limitation of amount that any one cares about. The responsibility that the Senator from Kentucky talks about would not be changed by putting in a limitation on the amount. They would have to go on just the same at the Departments, purchase ships, fit out the expedition, select officers to command it, send them off with a God-speed, and then trust to the winds and the waves and the ice of that undiscovered region as to what the result would be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HALE. Was it not accepted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Kansas to accept the amendment to his?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to limit the appropriation to $1,000,000, and the amendment of the Senator from Missouri limits it to $500,000. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the amount of money proposed is serious; but there are other matters connected with this expedition and other considerations that I believe are even graver—I refer to the risk to human life and happiness which is involved in this continued sending forth of human lives for these objects and upon ill-considered journeys—which I hope this resolution may impress upon the Senate and upon Congress. I do not doubt that, whether this expedition cost half a million or several millions of dollars, it is the duty of the Government that ordered these officers and men to this scene of peril and disaster, to do all it can to protect their lives and to bring them in safety to their homes, if that be possible. But while this is done, it seems to me it should operate as a restraint upon expeditions which, although they may have science for their object and philanthropy in some degree for their basis, are both serious and disastrous in their effects upon human happiness.

I have read, as I suppose most members of this body have read, the dreadful journals of Captain De Long. The recital of his sufferings and of those of the men who died under him is enough to chill the hearts of men and should make them very careful how they shall give public assent to any further expenditure in such directions. It is true it may teach the great lesson of heroism, but it is done at enormous human suffering, anxiety, and sorrow to those who survive and almost untold suffering to those who perish.

We are compelled, I agree, by every consideration, to do all that money may fairly do to bring back the survivors of these expeditions, but I say that they should teach us more caution in the future how we lend our assent to future expeditions of this disastrous kind.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, this Greely expedition did not originate with any of the Departments of the Government or from the recommendation of any particular Department. It was a measure originating in and passed through Congress. A small appropriation was made for the original expedition and the law required that such stores as could be furnished by the Navy and by the Army should be furnished for the expedition. It provided for sending a body of men to explore the northern regions of this continent and of the world, numbering twenty-two. They were to be volunteers. They were expected to go through a channel usually open in the summer season to Lady Franklin Bay; and to avoid the danger and the great risk to human life which had accompanied all these expeditions from the beginning down to the present time, the plan proposed that this band of men should be landed at the most northern point, where it was supposed in each year vessels could be sent without any great danger, and that the expedition from Lady Franklin Bay should be by land and not by water, on sledges and snow-shoes and not in boats, that it should proceed as far northward upon the land as possible; and for the safety of those engaged in the expedition a building was taken already constructed to be placed at Lady Franklin Bay as a home station, a starting-point for the exploration. It was intended that every ten, fifteen, or twenty miles as the party should proceed onward similar stations should be constructed, from point to point, with supplies passing along from one to another, so that there should be as little risk and as little danger of loss of life and of suffering as possible for the men engaged in the expedition.

Our Government was not alone in fitting out such an expedition. There were five different expeditions by five different governments contemplated and provided for and sent to different points around the circle of the unexplored regions toward the North Pole. These expeditions were sent by all these governments, and from that time to this have been engaged in the survey with more or less success.

These volunteers were called for by this Government and by its law to come and make these explorations for our Government. They expected to remain there three years. Provisions and materials were sent for their support during that time. At this location there is one of the finest coal-beds in the world, immediately adjoining the buildings that were sent and erected there, to supply fuel not only for that station but for the advancing stations of the northern survey. The faith of our Congress and of our Government is pledged to those men to send them supplies and at the end of three years to send proper provision for their return.

I desire in this connection to correct an error which was stated by one of the Senators, that in the expedition of last year the instructions were imperative to make a depot of provisions at Littleton Island. The records do not show that that was the order, and it is only fair to that gallant officer who commanded the expedition, Lieutenant Garlington, that such a statement should be contradicted here upon the floor of the Senate. Examination shows that he had no instructions to deposit at Littleton Island the provisions which were contemplated to be left there, but was to press forward to Lady Franklin Bay, and if they failed to reach that point, if the ice obstructed the passage of the vessel to that point, then the deposit was to be made at Littleton Island. It is due to the officer in command that that statement should be made here, for the testimony proves that to be the truth.

Now, sir, I submit to the Senators in this Chamber that the world will not permit these men to be unthought-for. This Government may fail to send a suitable expedition for their relief; but there are other governments that will send an expedition if we do fail, and fail to send a sufficient one, to the dishonor and disgrace of this Republic. Already preparations are being made in England to send such an expedition for the relief of these men, and, sir, we all can remember how often the Government of the United States at great expense has fitted out expeditions and expended money in the search for exploring parties for other nations lost in the wilds of the Arctic regions.

I am opposed to inserting any limitation in this resolution. Let it cost thousands or hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars, this nation cannot afford in the face of the whole civilized world to leave its volunteer explorers in the unknown seas and in the storms and tempests of an unknown land to perish there, until every effort has been exhausted to recover them and bring them back to their country and their homes. It is not one of those subjects about which economists and those desiring retrenchment can discuss very eagerly without reproach. The imperative duty rests upon the Congress who sent these men into that wild wilderness of ice and waters to return them if possible, to find out their condition and send them succor, and if this Government fails to do it, other governments, to the disgrace of our own, will do it for us.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HALE. Allow me to make a parliamentary inquiry. This is an amendment proposing a half million of dollars in place of a million dollars, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri is to limit the appropriation to $500,000. That is the pending question.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being an equal division of the Senate, the noes have it. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to limit the appropriation to $1,000,000.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 8, noes 26; not a quorum voting.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the call for a division will be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again, as there is undoubtedly a quorum present, without going through the formality prescribed by the rule of calling the roll.

Mr. BROWN. If it be in order, I should like to amend the amendment by striking out "one million" and inserting "six hundred thousand dollars."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, by striking out "one million," and inserting "six hundred thousand," as the limit of the appropriation. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 26.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. MAXEY. I now move, in order to have a limitation, that the words "one million" be stricken out and "seven hundred thousand" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas by striking out "one million" and inserting "seven hundred thousand."

Mr. HOAR. I propose to vote against that amendment, because it seems to me that the fixing of that sum by Congress is an invitation to the persons concerned to work up to it. It will be more economical to leave it without limit than to put in an unnecessarily large sum.

Mr. MAXEY. My own judgment has always been that these expeditions have been an attempt to defy the laws of nature, and every one of them inaugurated by any government has proven a disastrous failure. This last one was, to a certain degree, encouraged by Congress. I remember very well one of the officers who was urging the action taken here was by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] introduced to me. I opposed it. I thought it a very poor thing for a bright young officer, as he was, to pursue such an ignis fatuus; and the Senator from Kentucky took the same view. And yet these men were sent out. I admit that humanity demands that we shall send for them; but I believe, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and his estimate of half a million dollars, the putting forward the amount as I have put it to $700,000 will unquestionably be enough, and it leaves the appropriation restricted to what is fair and reasonable, taking the best testimony we have from the Naval Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, limiting the amount to $700,000.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 28.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask for the yeas and nays, so as to settle the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted--yeas 30, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Vance,
Brown,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vest,
Camden,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Ransom,

Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sherman,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to limit the appropriation to $1,000,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment, after the word "expedition," in line 4, to insert "to be composed of volunteers for the service."

As I understand the resolution, it gives the President power to dispatch an expedition, and it may be that he will order Army or Navy officers to go. I am unwilling to vote to give the President the power to assign to this service whom he pleases, without reference to their wishes in regard to it. Doubtless there may be individual men in the Navy ready to volunteer for the service, but I am unwilling to force any man, contrary to his will, when the great probability is that he will meet with the fate which the expeditions which have gone before have met. Though I think the amount of money appropriated is larger than is necessary, yet I shall cheerfully vote for the resolution provided the provision which I have suggested is incorporated in it; but I will not grant to the President the power to assign whom he may please to this dreadful service, so that he may select men who are unwilling to go, because of their connection with the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "expedition," it is proposed to insert "to be composed of volunteers for the service."

Mr. HALE. I will not take any time, but ask for the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of standing and select committees are still in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back the joint resolution (S. R. 27) as to giving notice to terminate the convention of June 2, 1875, with his majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, adversely, and recommend that the resolution be indefinitely postponed. I submit the report of the committee and accompanying papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and myself not being able to concur with the views of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to present the views of the minority, to be printed with the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, from a minority of the same committee, asks leave to present the views of the minority, and that they be printed in connection with the report of the majority. That order will be entered if there be no objection, and the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the majority and minority reports.

Mr. MORGAN. I report back, by the order of the same committee, the joint resolution (S. R. 33) as to giving notice to terminate the convention of June 3, 1875, with his majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, with the same recommendation, remarking that this resolution and the one just reported upon are in identical language throughout; and of course I suppose the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who introduced this resolution in the same terms as the previous one offered by his colleague, will not desire to have both resolutions on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama reports adversely Senate joint resolution No. 33. This joint resolution, if there be no objection, will be indefinitely postponed, it being identical with the one reported before and which was placed upon the Calendar.

CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back the resolution providing for clerks to Senators, which was referred to it, with a substitute, and with the recommendation that the substitute pass.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the immediate consideration of that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the resolution just reported be now considered.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read and then the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER, as follows:

Resolved, That each Senator, except the chairmen of standing or select committees of the Senate, shall be entitled to a clerk or secretary, at a salary of $1,000 annually, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That each Senator, except the chairmen of standing or select committees, may appoint a clerk to serve during the sessions of Congress, who shall perform such clerical work as may be assigned by the Senator appointing him in aid of the discharge of his official duties, and shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $6 a day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution as amended? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is still open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution. I have no desire to debate it. I should like to have the committee who reported it state the number of additional clerks this will involve.

Mr. BUTLER. I stated yesterday, thirty-five.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the ordinary average session of Congress what would the compensation be? What is the amount per annum according to the average sessions of Congress?

Mr. BUTLER. As I originally introduced the resolution I provided for a salary of $1,000 a year; but the committee have recommended that these clerks receive $6 a day during the session of Congress, as clerks of committees are paid. I do not know exactly what that would amount to, but I suppose perhaps $1,000 a year or a little more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FARLEY]. He would vote "yea" if present, and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. Having been absent from the Chamber momentarily when this resolution was reported, I had no opportunity to say that as a member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses I did not concur in the report.

I say this in explanation of the vote I am about to give, being on the committee. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Anthony,	Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Blair,	Gorman,	Kenna,	Pugh,
Bowen,	Hale,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lapham,	Riddleberger,
Butler,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Call,	Hoar,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Camden,	Jackson,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Jonas,	Morgan,	Wilson.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,

NAYS—19.

Coke,	George,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Conger,	Harris,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Vest,

Cameron of Pa.,	Farley,	Pendleton,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Sabin,

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 120) giving the thanks of Congress to the men who rescued the survivors of the wreck of the steamer City of Columbus; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1482) making all public roads and highways post-routes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 462) to provide for the removal of obstructions to the free navigation of the navigable waters of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 356) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to return from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 143) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold, and ask its reference to the Committee on Claims. From the character of the bill it is proper that it should go to the Committee on Claims.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883, to report it without amendment. As it is a matter of small moment I ask that it may be considered now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the joint resolution had better go over, at any rate until after the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no objection to its consideration after the conclusion of the morning business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1253) to fix the salaries and prescribe certain duties of district judges of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1254) referring the claim of Apollos Hale, administrator, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 1255) to appropriate $10,000 for the improvement of the Oconee River, in the State of Georgia, between Skull Shoals and the Georgia Railroad bridge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for immediate action on the bill. I will state by way of explanation that it requires no appropriation, being merely to authorize the Secretary of War to pay the expense out of the contingent fund that he has in his charge.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. It will not take a minute. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If only a few minutes it stops business, and the time has been so much occupied already.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator from Illinois wish to have the bill referred?

Mr. LOGAN. Let it lie on the table. I desire to call it up as soon as possible to have it acted upon. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Some disposition must be made of the bill. It must be laid on the table, or referred, or placed on the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1257) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of Smith & Hine; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1258) for the preservation of the woods and forests of the national domain adjacent to the sources of the navigable rivers and their affluents in the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1259) granting arrears of pension to W. N. Berkley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1260) granting a pension to William J. Duley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1261) for the relief of William J. Duley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 1262) to provide for the sale of certain lands of the Eastern Band of Cherokees in North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1263) for the relief of Fred. Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1264) for the relief of the heirs of Black Beaver; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1265) to grant drawback on imported materials used in the manufacture of articles for exportation; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state that this bill is similar in its subject-matter to a bill introduced by me early in the session, and which is pending upon the Calendar. I have obtained in connection with the bill a letter from one of the officers of the Government having special knowledge upon the subject, which I think contains information pertinent and which will be useful to the committee. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that the letter be printed in the RECORD. It will occupy perhaps twenty lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the paper which he has described upon the subject of the bill be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know from anybody what the probable length of the paper is.

Mr. BLAIR. It will occupy probably twenty printed lines.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print in the RECORD will be entered, if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, NEW YORK,
Collector's Office, January 15, 1884.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to submit the following relative to drawback on articles of domestic manufacture. It would be impracticable to name the different articles upon which drawback rates have been established by the Treasury Department. For such information you are respectfully referred to the printed schedule of drawback rates, dated December 15, 1879, and to Department decisions since that date.

New articles are constantly being added to the list, but none are so admitted without act of Congress, unless made wholly from imported materials.

Upon all articles of domestic manufacture exported with benefit of drawback under existing law 10 per cent. of such drawback is retained for the use of the United States, with the exception of refined sugar, upon which article but 1 per cent. is retained. It is understood that this retention is intended to cover expenses of refunding, by way of drawback, the amount of duties paid on the imported materials used in making the exported articles.

In my opinion the amount so retained is largely in excess of the expenses incurred. It is impossible for me to determine what the actual expenses are, and I hesitate to express an opinion on the subject, but venture to say that such expenses are no greater on many of the articles of domestic manufacture than on manufactured articles imported from Canada and elsewhere and exported in bond, upon which this Government receives only the usual custom-house fees.

Very respectfully,

H. B. UHLEE,
Chief Clerk Drawback Department.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR, Washington, D. C.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a bill (S. 1266) for the relief of the farmers of the United States by extending to them the benefits of the Signal Service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 1267) for the relief of Alfred Huckaby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Sydney L. Skaggs; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1269) for the relief of Caroline T. Bancroft; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1270) for the benefit of Mrs. Mary H. Chawning; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday's sitting, being the bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the bill may be received. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1271) in relation to the Chinese indemnity fund; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay over to the Government of China the fund now under the control of the Secretary of State of the United States known as the Chinese indemnity fund.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I simply desire to say in relation to the bill that it is in direct line with an act which was passed by Congress at its last session for the return of the Japanese indemnity fund. The present Chinese indemnity fund, which is in the keeping of the Secretary of State, grows out of a convention between China and the United States concluded November 8, 1858, under which China paid over three-quarters of a million dollars into our hands for the purpose of indemnifying citizens of the United States for losses which occurred during the war of Great Britain and France against China in 1856 and 1857. This money was given for the express purpose of liquidating specified claims. These claims have been liquidated, I understand, and there is still a large sum of money remaining in the hands of the Secretary of State for which there are no claimants. This money undoubtedly belongs to China, and should be returned. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 47) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 48) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA AND MISSISSIPPI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question on the unfinished business is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is proceeded with I ask the Chair whether it will not be in order now to proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order under the ninth rule, the Chair believes, for any Senator to move to proceed to the consideration of anything on the Calendar. The resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio is not on the Calendar. If the morning hour had not been exhausted before the order of resolutions was reached it would have been the duty of the Chair, as the Chair thinks, to lay the resolution before the Senate (as a resolution objected to yesterday) for its action; but as the hour of 2 o'clock arrived before the order of resolutions was reached the Chair was unable under the rule to lay it before the Senate. He will therefore lay it before the Senate to-morrow, just as he would a House bill read the first time in a similar case.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right. I only desired for the information of myself and also of Senators on the other side to know when the resolution would come up in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will come up in order when "resolutions" are reached to-morrow. It is the first thing under the head of "resolutions."

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Chair be good enough to repeat the disposition made of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state, that, on examining the rules, not in reference to that resolution, but all resolutions, though the rules are not very clear on the subject, the Chair came to the conclusion that a resolution objected to, like the second reading of a bill being objected to, would go over on the desk of the Chair until the next day, and then, like a bill having been read a first time, would be laid before the Senate when the order of resolutions was reached. But as the order of resolutions was not reached to-day at 2 o'clock when the rules require the Chair to lay the unfinished business before the Senate, the resolution still remains on the table of the Chair, and when the order of resolutions is reached to-morrow it will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Will it be presented to the Senate before 2 o'clock under the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. At what time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is ended and the order of resolutions is reached, the Chair, under his construction of the rules touching all resolutions, would lay it before the Senate, the Chair thinking that the theory and principle of the rules about bills and resolutions is that every Senator should have an opportunity to have a bill or resolution once presented to the Senate, and if not then disposed of it goes upon the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desired to know the order of business. It will be treated then as capable of being put on its passage when the call for resolutions is made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid before the Senate for such disposition as the Senate chooses to make of it.

J. J. M'ELHONE.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the unfinished business is proceeded with, I ask unanimous consent to pass a little joint resolution (H. Res. 117) which I reported this morning. It relates to the convenience of the reporters of the House of Representatives and will take but a minute.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall not interpose an objection to that, but I am anxious to proceed with the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Iowa will be read for information.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883, was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It appropriates $1,000 to pay J. J. McElhone, chief of the corps of official reporters of the House of Representatives, for extra services and for clerk-hire paid out by him during the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for the Territory of Alaska, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BOWEN to the amendment of Mr. HARRISON.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON was, after the word "aforesaid," in line 17 of section 8, to insert:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall appoint suitable persons to make surveys of mining claims; and the commissioners provided for by this act shall discharge the duties now required by law of registers and receivers of public lands in relation to such claims.

The amendment to the amendment was, after the word "That," in line 1, section 8, to insert:

> The said district of Alaska is hereby created a land district, and a United States land office for said district is hereby located at Sitka. The commissioner provided for by this act to reside at Sitka shall be ex officio register of said land office, and the clerk provided for by this act shall be ex officio receiver of public moneys. All orders for the survey of mining claims shall be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall likewise appoint one deputy mineral surveyor for said district, who shall hold his office until removed by said Secretary; and all plats and field-notes of surveys of mining claims shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, who shall, if he approve the same, certify to the fact in the same manner as is done by surveyors-general in districts or Territories having surveyors-general; and he shall likewise certify the amount expended in money or labor on each claim the plats and field-notes of the survey of which he approves, and shall transmit three certified copies of such plats and field-notes, together with one certificate of labor and improvements, to the register of said land office, who shall file and preserve in his office one copy of such plat and one copy of such field-notes, and shall deliver in each case the remaining copies of such plats and field-notes to the claimant of the mining claim, who may proceed to apply for and obtain patent from the Government of the United States in the same manner and with like effect as if such survey had been ordered, and the plats and field-notes thereof had been approved, and the certificate of labor and improvements made by a surveyor-general; and.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I can save some time by suggesting to the Senate now a modification of these amendments which has been agreed upon between me and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. I propose taking the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado in relation to the establishment of a land district, to insert, after the word "moneys," in his amendment, in line 6, the words "and the marshal provided for by this act shall be ex officio surveyor-general of said district; and" and to strike out all the rest of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment as I now propose it provides a full complement of officers for the administration of the land laws by conferring upon the commissioner the duties of register, upon the clerk the duties of receiver, and upon the marshal the duties of surveyor-general of the Territory, and makes unnecessary all the detail which follows in the amendment as presented by the Senator from Colorado. This modification has been agreed upon between the Senator from Colorado and myself, and I suppose the record might show that my amendment was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado withdraw his amendment to the amendment and does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BOWEN. The proper way I think would be for the Senator from Indiana to withdraw his amendment and accept my substitute with the amendment which he proposes to that. I suppose that would make the record read right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair simply desired to know that the two pending amendments were withdrawn, and the Chair would then entertain the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I see no objection to that course.

Mr. BOWEN. There being the office of surveyor-general provided for, it obviates the necessity for all the great detail that was embraced in the rest of my amendment. In fact there was no surveyor-general necessary if an existing officer could be made such ex officio. The general laws of the United States are ample; they point out the details.

Mr. HARRISON. The record may then show that the amendment I offered to section 8 is withdrawn and that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to that amendment is withdrawn, and that I then proposed the amendment which I have just outlined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two amendments heretofore offered, one by the Senator from Indiana and the other by the Senator from Colorado, being withdrawn, the Secretary will report the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "that," the first word in section 8, it is proposed to insert:

> The said district of Alaska is hereby created a land district, and a United States land office for said district is hereby located at Sitka. The commissioner provided for by this act to reside at Sitka shall be ex officio register of said land office, and the clerk provided for by this act shall be ex officio receiver of public moneys, and the marshal provided for by this act shall be ex officio surveyor-general of said district; and.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I now ask that the amendment proposed by me a while age to come in at the end of section 8 may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 22, section 8, it is proposed to add:

> But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to put in force in said district the general land laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In section 8, line 9, after the word "occupation," I move to insert "or now claimed by them," being the amendment which I proposed day before yesterday; so as to make the proviso read:

> Provided, That the Indians or other persons in said district shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands actually in their use or occupation or now claimed by them, but the terms under which such persons may acquire title to such lands is reserved for future legislation by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. HARRISON. As I said to the Senate yesterday, it was the intention of the committee to protect to the fullest extent all the rights of the Indians in Alaska and of any residents who had settled there, but at the same time to allow the development of the mineral resources of that Territory, if there are such resources, as seems to be believed. As the amount of territory that could be taken up under the mining law would be very small, and as the prospectors or claimants under the law could not invade, under this bill, the actual territory occupied by any one, we supposed the provisions of the bill were sufficient; but I do not care to antagonize seriously the proposition of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. The first amendment which I proposed to offer after the one just disposed of is to section 1. At the end of section 1 I move to insert:

The temporary seat of government of said district is hereby established at Sitka.

No seat of government is fixed in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In regard to the proviso in section 8 of the bill as reported from the committee, giving absolute title to 640 acres of land surrounding each missionary station, I am advised by those who claim to know, by reason of personal inspection, that that would work a very great injustice; that there are located near the missions not only Indians who claim title, but also white men, and that to spread out the mission reservation to the extent of a mile square would undoubtedly dispossess a great many people and lead to a great deal of trouble. As the bill is merely tentative, I suggest that instead of that the proviso be so amended as that those people may be permitted to occupy what they are now occupying until we get the report called for in section 12, instead of confirming to them absolutely 640 acres of land, which, as I am informed and believe, would result in dispossessing persons who are on the ground, and who are entitled to just as much consideration as the missionaries themselves.

I therefore move to amend the last proviso of section 8 by striking out in line 17 the words "title to the" before "land;" in line 20, inserting "shall" after "societies," and striking out the words "confirmed and established in," and inserting "continued in the occupancy of;" and adding at the close of the proviso the words "until action by Congress;" amending the proviso in such a way that the missionary stations shall remain with the precise boundaries and holdings that they have now temporarily confirmed to them until such time as Congress can be advised and determine exactly what they shall have permanently.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to move to substitute the word "possession" for "title?"

Mr. PLUMB. I propose to make the proviso read:

That the land, not exceeding 640 acres at any station now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said section, with the improvements thereon erected by or for such societies, shall be continued in the occupancy of the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong until action by Congress.

That is to say, they shall simply be permitted to occupy the land as they are now occupying it until such time as we come with knowledge to settle their rights permanently.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the criticism of the Senator from Kansas is probably just. The provision which he seeks to amend is similar in kind to provisions inserted in the laws organizing both Oregon and Washington as Territories; yet as the theory of the bill is to keep open all matters of claims to land until the report can be received, it would perhaps be more in harmony with the general scope of the bill if the proviso were put in some such shape as the Senator suggests. I suggest to him, however, that the word "possession" be inserted instead of "title," and that it be made to read, "the possession of the land now occupied."

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that or any other form of language which will carry out the idea.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps the Senator's amendment will be found to cover it if he will have it reported.

Mr. PLUMB. My amendment simply provides that the land shall be continued to them in their occupancy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas as proposed to be modified will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 17, it is proposed to strike out the words "title to" and insert "possession of;" in line 20, to insert "shall" after "societies;" in line 21, to strike out the words "confirmed and established in" and insert "continued in the occupancy of;" and in the last line of the proviso, after the word "belong," to insert "until action by Congress."

Mr. HARRISON. Excuse me; the clause would not read properly.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask the Secretary to read the proviso as I originally proposed to amend it, and I think it will be seen that that will answer the purpose just as well.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided also, That the land, not exceeding 640 acres at any station, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said section, with the improvements thereon erected by or for such societies, shall be continued in the occupancy of the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong until action by Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I see no objection to that in its present shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. I have several other amendments to propose, and I should like to keep the floor until all of them are placed before the Senate. In section 3, line 8, after the word "shall," I move to insert "during his term of office;" so as to read:

And a district judge shall be appointed for said district, who shall, during his term of office, reside therein.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. In section 4, line 3, after the word "shall," I move to insert "during their terms of office;" so as to read:

That a clerk shall be appointed for said court, who shall be ex officio secretary and treasurer of said district, a district attorney, and a marshal, all of whom shall, during their terms of office, reside therein.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. In section 4, line 14, after the word "mortgages," relating to the duties of the clerk of the court, I move to insert "and certificates of location of mining claims;" so as to read:

He shall be ex officio recorder of deeds and mortgages and certificates of location of mining claims, and other contracts relating to real estate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. In section 7, line 20, after the word "court," I move to insert the words "or judge." That is where the section provides that a certain length of time shall be given for an appeal, and the appeal bond it seems by the bill is to be approved by the court. Of course there will be no court out of the Territory. I have proposed to add the words "or judge," so that the judge in vacation may approve an appeal bond.

Mr. HARRISON. The court referred to, from which the appeals are to be prosecuted, is the commissioner's court which is constituted. I do not think the term "judge" would perhaps correctly describe that officer. He is to discharge judicial functions, those of a justice of the peace and those of a commissioner under the laws of the United States. "Or the commissioner" would be more appropriate than "or judge," or perhaps "to be approved by the commissioner" would be still better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana propose an amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator to substitute the word "commissioner" for "judge." The appeal referred to is an appeal from the commissioners. That part of section 7 reads:

In all civil cases, at common law, any issue of fact shall be determined by a jury at the instance of either party; and an appeal shall lie in any case, civil or criminal, from the judgment of said commissioners to the said district court, where the amount involved is $200 or more, upon the filing of a sufficient appeal bond by the party appealing, to be approved by the court.

Mr. BOWEN. Then let the words "or commissioner" be inserted after "court."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado modifies his amendment by striking out the word "judge" and inserting the word "commissioner;" so as to read:

Upon the filing of a sufficient appeal bond by the party appealing, to be approved by the court or commissioner.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment so modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submitted an amendment yesterday intended to be proposed to the bill. I desire now to make a verbal change in the amendment. I used the term "Alaska Fur Seal Company." I am told that the name is the Alaska Seal Fur Company. I desire to make that modification in the amendment, and I desire also after the word "Congress," in the fourth line of my amendment, to add "the results of such inquiries and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, at the end of line 28, it is proposed to add:

The governor and commissioners to be appointed under the provisions of this act shall, from time to time, inquire into the operations of the Alaska Seal Fur Company, and shall annually report to Congress the results of such inquiries and any and all violations by said company of the agreement existing between the United States and said company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that there is a contract between that company and the United States by which the company pay for certain privileges granted to them the sum of $300,000, or something over that. The operations of that company are principally at the islands on the coast of Alaska, several thousand miles from the seat of this government. I understand that the supervision of that contract is by a Treasury agent appointed by that Department; and it occurred to me that as we are providing officers adjacent to the scene of their operations we ought to confer upon those officers some supervising power to inquire into and ascertain the operations of the company, and whether any violation of the contract existing between the Government and the company has taken place or does take place.

I have therefore offered this amendment. I do not know that it reaches the result I desire to reach, but I think the Government ought to have complete supervision over that company or any other company that is invested with remunerative privileges under any agreement with the Government, and I offer this amendment as the best I could.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection in the world to using any of the officers provided for by the bill for the purpose of exercising any just supervision over the relations of the Alaska Fur Seal Company to the Government of the United States. I suggest, however, to the Senator from Delaware that he has coupled here the governor and the commissioners, making a board of five. The commissioners and the governor will be residing—I hesitate to say how many miles apart, but certainly they will not be more convenient to each other for conference in relation to a matter of this kind than a person resident in New York would be to one resident in Saint Louis. I think I am not exaggerating perhaps as to the extremes of the stations that are fixed; at least they are very widely apart. That being so, and this amendment constituting five a sort of commission to make such an inquiry, it would involve an expense for which we have no appropriation in getting them together.

I suggest, therefore, to the Senator that he strike out the commissioners and devolve the duty upon the governor, and then we should have it devolved upon a single individual, who would be able to exercise some such supervision. That would be in harmony with the provisions of the bill, which require the governor to report through the President to Congress upon all subjects affecting the interests of the Territory. I do not think anybody can make an objection to that, but coupling the commissioners with the governor would make a very awkward commission for this purpose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt that there is wisdom in the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. I did not know what might be the locations of the commissioners. I inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether it might not be proper to associate with the governor the district judge who is to be appointed for that district?

Mr. HARRISON. I should object to that, for the reason that the judge is designated to perform judicial functions and this would confer upon him a ministerial function. Cases might come before his own court to try as a judge which he would have already investigated as a commissioner under such a provision, and which would disqualify him for that sort of service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not understand that anything in connection with that service would ever come before his court, for the amendment requires that the report shall be made to Congress. However, I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana and so modify my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator had better do that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will modify my amendment by striking out the words "and commissioners," so as to leave the matter with the governor.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest then to strike out the words "and commissioners to be," so as to read simply "the governor appointed under the provisions of this act shall, from time to time, inquire into the operations," &c.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In section 12, line 6, after the word "use," I move to insert "what provision should be made for their education and support;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall select two of the officers to be appointed under this act, who, together with the governor, shall constitute a commission to examine into and report upon the condition of the Indians residing in said Territory, what lands, if any, should be reserved for their use, what provision should be made for their education and support, what rights by occupation of settlers should be recognized, and all other facts that may be necessary to enable Congress to determine what limitations or conditions should be imposed when the land laws of the United States shall be extended to said district; and to defray the expenses of said commission the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I want simply to enlarge the subject of the report to be made by the governor and the commissioners in regard to the Indians. The report called for by the section as it now stands refers simply to the land to be reserved for their use and occupancy; but in view of the action taken yesterday I desire that we shall have the report broad enough to enlighten us upon what our relations ought to be in other respects. I therefore move the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Kansas to strike out the words "and support."

Mr. PLUMB. I consent to that.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think we ought to introduce that suggestion.

Mr. PLUMB. Probably not. I accept the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, and so modified the question is on agreeing to the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I should like to have the Secretary of the Senate read section 15 of the bill as now amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the fifteenth section of the bill. It is now section 14, the former fourteenth section having been stricken out.

Mr. VEST. I refer to the last section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the provisions of chapter 3, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the unorganized Territory of Alaska, shall remain in full force, except as herein specially otherwise provided; and the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

Mr. VEST. Is that section now open for amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment, every section of it.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out the words "and the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited," and to insert:

And the commissioners appointed under this act shall be authorized to restrict, regulate, or prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

So as to read:

And the commissioners appointed under this act shall be authorized to restrict, regulate, or prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the irritating question of prohibition or the temperance agitation, but I simply want to say that we ought to be consistent, and we ought not to practice a little hypocrisy here among ourselves. We have to-day a statute in regard to Indian reservations which prohibits the selling or giving of intoxicating liquors to any Indian, but the Secretary of War, I believe, in the language of the statute, is permitted to allow intoxicating liquors to be introduced into any reservation at his discretion. Section 2139 of the Revised Statutes reads:

SEC. 2139. No ardent spirits shall be introduced, under any pretense, into the Indian country. Every person, except an Indian, in the Indian country, who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, shall be punishable by imprisonment for not more than two years, and by a fine of not more than $300. But it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce liquor into the Indian country, that the acts charged were done by order of or under authority from the War Department, or any officer duly authorized thereunto by the War Department.

In the act referred to in the bill relating to the unorganized Territory of Alaska the provision is as follows:

The President shall have power to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of fire-arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into and within the Territory of Alaska.

In the first place, this is not an Indian reservation. This is a Territory; it is an inchoate State. If we propose now to establish the principle of prohibition, let us do it in a fair, just, and manly way. Do not let us sneak in the doctrine as to a country which is hibernated for eight months in the year and force the inhabitants, whether American citizens or not, in the midst of thick-ribbed ice to live on ice-water, while in the rest of the Territories the inhabitants are drinking any quantity of alcoholic stimulants at their own sweet will and pleasure.

We are now about to prepare these people for admission as a sovereign State; and the argument I presume for this extraordinary provision is that that country is populated almost entirely by Indians. I see upon my desk this morning, and I presume it is upon the desk of every other Senator, a statement of the native tribes of Alaska. This paper, coming from the superintendent of the Presbyterian missions in Alaska (and I take it that proceeding from so reverend and ecclesiastical a source the statement must be correct), states that—

The native population of Alaska is about 34,019, including 1,683 creoles or half-breeds. Of these, 19,698 are classed as Orarians and 12,698 as Indians.

Then it goes on with the subdivisions of the Orarians and the Indians.

More than that, this amendment is the most extraordinary that ever has prevailed upon this continent. While serving upon an Indian committee last summer it was my fortune to be found in the northwestern province of Canada, the other side of what is known as the Dominion. There the council has established a prohibition law the most stringent I believe ever enacted on the continent of North America or anywhere else. They prohibit the importation, the sale, the manufacture, the giving away, or the drinking of liquor except for medicinal purposes; and in order to get a drink you must have not only the certificate of a physician, but he must certify that he has physically examined the person and found that alcohol is absolutely necessary as a medicine. But this amendment goes further than that. This amendment prohibits the use of alcoholic stimulants even for medicinal purposes. It prohibits the importation or use for any purpose whatever. It takes away all discretion from the authorities of the United States or of the Territory of Alaska. I do not propose to say whether that is right or wrong. I have my opinion on prohibition, which I have openly announced, and which I propose to announce at the proper time, but I do not choose to go into that now.

If the friends of this bill, and I am not inimical to it, propose to inaugurate this principle as to the Territories of the United States, in the name of fair play, consistency, and honest dealing with each other, let us apply it to all the Territories. Let us make it at once what I think the mover of this provision incorporated in the bill intended it to be, an affirmative approval of the doctrine of prohibition everywhere that the authority of the United States extends.

I shall vote against the bill with this provision in it. With my opinions in regard to the principle of prohibition I shall vote against it, although I am on the committee that reported the bill to the Senate. I shall vote against the doctrine wherever I find it to the extent that it is laid down in this bill. The attempt by legislation of the United States Congress or by any other tribunal to stamp out the existence of what is an article of commerce and to say that it shall not be used for medicinal or any other purposes is so foreign to my ideas of the rights of American citizenship and of the Constitution of the United States even, that I shall never be found in favor of it at any time or at any place.

For these reasons, sir, I have moved the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think that even with prohibition those Indians will suffer a great deal, for I find on page 120 of the tract which the Senator spoke about that the people of San Francisco are exceedingly hospitable to them. They have a gathering place at Noyatäg River, where they meet in force to sell skins, &c. It says:

> It is to these gatherings that the traders come in schooners fitted out at San Francisco or Sandwich Islands, with cargoes of whisky labeled "Florida water," "Bay rum," "Pain-killer," "Jamaica ginger," &c. The finest furs of Alaska are obtained at these fairs.

So that the medicines even with prohibition will get in as "Bay rum," "Florida water," and "Jamaica ginger." In regard to the frozen water, which seems to arouse the sensibility of the Senator from Missouri a little bit, my judgment is from what occurs on the next column that frozen water will not be quite so bad for those poor Indians as rum that is not frozen:

> Directly south of Behring Straits is the large island of Saint Lawrence. Formerly it had a population of eight hundred. They are the largest and finest-formed people of the Innuit race—but slaves to whisky.
> In the summer of 1878 they bartered their furs, ivory, and whalebone to the traders for rum. And as long as the rum lasted they spent their summer in idleness and drunkenness, instead of preparing for winter. The result was that over four hundred of them starved to death the next winter. In some villages not a single man, woman, or child was left to tell the horrible tale.

If under a prohibitory law they were deprived of their "Bay rum" and "Florida water," I do not believe they would suffer from disease any more than those poor Indians of Saint Lawrence suffered from the California whisky which they received in exchange for their furs.

Mr. PLUMB. I stated yesterday the theory upon which I proposed the amendment to the clause which the Senator from Missouri seeks to amend. We are legislating for a Territory in which a large majority of the people are Indians. I do not care whether you call them Aleuts or Sioux, or what you call them, they are still Indians according to a proper application of that generic phrase. They are subject especially to the vice of whisky-drinking, which has been so recognized from the time when the white man first came to deal with them. It is an offense now under the statutes of the United States (and I do not think it has ever aroused the sensibilities of anybody before) to take a drop of liquor into the Indian Territory. There are more white people to-day living under prohibition, whatever the effect of it may be, in the Indian Territory by ten to one (and when I say the Indian Territory I mean that Territory set apart and known as the Indian Territory lying west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas) than there are in the Territory of Alaska, or probably will be for years to come. I hope that when the bowels of compassion of the Senator from Missouri are moved for the people living under the shadow of the Arctic circle in Alaska, he will give some of his sympathy to the people who are living in the Indian Territory. If he appeals to me to know why we shall not make the same rule in regard to the other Territories of the United States, I hope that he will himself respond to the inquiry which I now propound: Why not extend the rule which he seeks to establish in Alaska also to the Indian Territory?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to put a question to him on that subject?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would ask him if there is any treaty stipulation between this and any other government in the world guaranteeing to the citizens in the Indian Territory the rights of citizens of the United States?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Florida need not have asked me that question, because he could have answered it better than I. It answers itself. As a matter of course we have no treaty relations with any foreign power in regard to the people living in the Indian Territory; but the inference from the inquiry is that we are not permitted to deal with this question at all in Alaska; that we can not put any embargo upon anything which we regard as injurious to the Indians in the Territory of Alaska. If the Senator from Florida is willing to put himself upon that position, I am ready to meet him there.

It is in evidence not only from the testimony which the Senator from Maine has read but testimony which is in the mouth of every person who knows anything about that Territory, that there is no Indian population on the North American continent so susceptible to the bad influences of intoxicating liquors as the Indian population of Alaska. The entire danger that has arisen there to the white people by reason of their contact with them has grown out of the fact that they use intoxicating liquors, which madden them, which excite them to murder, which place human life and property and every other thing that is desirable under a system of social order in peril.

Therefore, following the example that I find put down under section 2139 of the Revised Statutes, to the effect that no ardent spirits shall be introduced under any pretense into the Indian country, I proposed the amendment which was adopted yesterday. If when we come to deal with this question at large the white people there shall find themselves deprived of some privilege which they regard as valuable they can make their wants known, but pending that I simply desire to establish the same rule in regard to the Indians in Alaska that we have established everywhere else on this continent where we had to deal with Indians by law.

I do not care now to be drawn into the general question of prohibition, which the Senator from Missouri seems to hanker after. He and I both will have occasion, no doubt, to talk about that question to people who are as fully enlightened and a great deal more cognizant of its practical effects than the people of Alaska. I welcome him to all he can make out of it here or elsewhere. This is not the time nor is it the occasion for the introduction of that question in its large aspects, but it is simply the question of our relations to the Indian population, as to whether in dealing with them we shall extend the same rule of humanity in the exclusion of intoxicating liquors from them that we have applied to all the other Indians elsewhere.

Mr. VEST. Using the euphonious and classic language of the Senator from Kansas, I am not "hankering" after a debate on prohibition; nothing of the sort. I simply called the attention of the Senate to the fact that for the first time in the legislative history of the United States we are applying a rule to the Territory of Alaska which we have never applied to any other.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was pleased to read some extracts from a Presbyterian tract to which I had referred, and with the usual facility of gentlemen who come from prohibition States, he assumed to put me, as that interesting class of people always do in regard to their opponents, in the category of those who are defending the ravages the use of alcohol has made in the human family, both savage and civilized. That is about as logical as the rest of the remarks made by him and the Senator from Kansas. The difference between those gentlemen and myself is that I plead for a little consistency and for honest and fair dealing on this question, without any discussion of the proper way to stop or diminish the evil effects of the use of alcoholic stimulants in the United States and its Territories, and I will go as far as any Senator in an honorable and legitimate and consistent attempt to legislate against that evil whenever and wherever I properly can. Do these Senators mean to say that they will vote for an amendment which prohibits the use of alcoholic liquors for medicinal purposes in any part of the Territories of this country? Find me the State where such extreme legislation has ever been had. Is it in Maine? Is it in Kansas, the youngest daughter? Even in those States alcoholic liquors for medicinal purposes are recognized as a portion of the pharmacopœia and used under the law.

The Senator from Kansas asks, why not apply this to Alaska as well as to the Indian Territory? Why, Mr. President, we must look to reason. The Senator ignores in the statutes of the United States the clause in regard to the Indian country, which provides that the Secretary of War may allow the introduction of alcoholic liquors into the Indian country. It is allowed under the statute. The Senator says why not apply the same rule? I ask him why do you not apply the same rule to Alaska? The Indian Territory is down at the lower extremity of the temperate zone, where cattle the year round graze on the natural grasses, and there the use of alcoholic stimulants is permitted; but by this section it is absolutely prohibited even for medicinal purposes in a country where the thermometer goes to 50 or 75 degrees below zero, and where men are hibernated like bears for eight months in the year.

The Senator from Maine has chosen to be facetious about ice-water and my choice of ice-water. Mr. President, I simply mean to say if you have ice-water in Alaska, have it in the other Territories. I do not want to make fish of one and flesh of the other. The Indian Territory, of which the Senator from Kansas speaks, has always had a liberal supply of alcoholic stimulants. There never has been a time when they could not be had in any portion of that Territory, notwithstanding the prohibitory law.

I oppose this amendment of the Senator from Kansas frankly because I will not be committed on this floor to a principle in which I do not believe. I will not be committed here to afflicting the peoples of any portion of the territory of the United States with legislation which I would not apply in every other portion of it and in my own State. I do not believe in the principle, and I shall not by my vote assent to it.

I am not hypocrite enough, thank God, or coward enough to sit here and vote for this bill with such a clause in it. The Senate of the United States has put its approval on this doctrine, because these people have no representative on this floor and are all under the shadow of the North Pole, as the Senator expressed it.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to make a few remarks, but I want to hear the proposed amendment read along with the context before I proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment agreed to as section 14 by striking out the words "importation"——

Mr. HARRISON. In order that the Senator from Arkansas may follow the reading, let me say that it is section 15, as he has the bill before him in print, section 14 having gone out.

Mr. GARLAND. Section 15?

Mr. HARRISON. Section 15 as printed.

Mr. GARLAND. That is what confused me. Now let the Secretary read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out in line 6 the words "importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited," and to insert after the word "the," in line 5, the words:

Commissioners appointed under this act shall be authorized to restrict, regulate, or prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday in reference to the features of this bill, commencing with section 13 and going to the end, I think they are not necessary elements of the bill to provide a Territorial government for Alaska, but it was thought proper to put them in so as to prevent a double labor and to accomplish everything we want there in the way of a Territorial government and the education of these people in one measure. In the committee I agreed to that, although at first I thought it was better to have the provisions separated.

I think in the minds of some Senators there is a misapprehension as to the purport of this bill. The bill does not undertake to provide what we call technically a Territorial government for Alaska, but under the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the territory and the other property belonging to the United States we deemed that Congress had the power to provide just such a government as it saw proper there, anything short, if you please, of a regular Territorial government, as we understand it technically.

This is somewhat of a mixed form of government that we provide for the Territory under this bill. The argument of the Senator from Missouri would have some force in it if this bill were a bill providing the ordinary government of a Territory. We have now a kind of mixed government in the Indian Territory. We have a somewhat more mixed government under this bill for the Territory of Alaska. Therefore, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is perfectly correct that on account of the large number of Indians in this Territory we simply carry out and enforce there in reference to this matter of distilled spirits what we enforce in the Indian country proper by the non-intercourse act between the United States and the Indian country, which non-intercourse act has been in force for many years, is very stringent, very rigid, and is rigidly and strictly interpreted by the courts when that act comes before them.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. Does the intercourse act apply to Alaska?

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir; I did not say it applied to Alaska. I said that parallel with what is done in the Indian Territory we apply to this mixed government in the Territory of Alaska on this subject of ammunition and distilled spirits the same provisions. What provisions? The provisions that have been in force really for sixteen years in reference to the Territory of Alaska. We do not tell the President that he must prohibit the use of spirituous liquors there, but we permit him, as section 1955 permits him, to regulate or to prohibit as he sees proper. That is the statute which that country has been under for sixteen years, since July, 1868. If I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri; he simply changes it from the President to a commission. I do not see the importance of that difference, and I must beg the Senator's pardon if he says this is throwing before the country the somewhat troublesome question of prohibition in all its length and breadth. It is simply permitting what has been going on for sixteen years in that country, and as far as it is applicable is the same provision that we enforce in the Indian country under the non-intercourse or intercourse law, as you choose to term it.

When it comes to the matter of prohibition I concur with the Senator from Missouri to the fullest extent that it is all bosh; it does not prohibit, and it ought not to be undertaken. You might as well, in my judgment, talk about taking a defective eyelash out of a man's eye with a pair of tongs. You may put out the eye, but you will never get at the trouble with the tongs. I think the Senator has mistaken the purport of this bill on that proposition. It simply leaves the President where section 1955 does and where the intercourse or non-intercourse act between the United States and the Indian country leaves that. I think the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is not proper.

Mr. VEST. Allow me another question.

M. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. The Senator was on the subcommittee that prepared this bill for the Committee on Territories. Now, under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas which we have adopted can alcoholic stimulants be introduced into Alaska under any state of case whatever, even for medicinal purposes? I ask the Senator as a lawyer has he any doubt about that proposition?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not understand the question.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator as a lawyer whether under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas which we have adopted alcoholic stimulants can be introduced into the Territory of Alaska for any purpose, even for medicinal purposes?

Mr. GARLAND. Unless I have very much misunderstood the amendment, I believe they can.

Mr. VEST. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report that clause of the bill as it stands.

Mr. VEST. By that amendment I say they can not; not a drop can go there for any purpose whatever; no drug store can sell spirits. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the provisions of chapter 3, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the unorganized Territory of Alaska, shall remain in full force, except as herein specially otherwise provided; and the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district is hereby prohibited, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits.

Mr. GARLAND. I misunderstood the amendment.

Mr. VEST. I say that under that provision not a drop of any sort of alcoholic stimulants, intoxicating liquors, can be carried to Alaska, even to save human life.

Mr. GARLAND. I misunderstood the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. My impression was that it left the matter where section 1955 of the Revised Statutes leaves it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think the Senator from Kansas has fallen into a grave error in classifying the Indians of Alaska with our Indians. The condition of the two classes is very different. It is the policy of the Government with respect to the one to keep the Indian Territory entirely for the benefit of the Indians, and it is its policy to exclude as far as possible white people from going among them. In the other case we have a Territory the dimensions of which almost baffle human calculation. It is being put down as being as large as six hundred thousand square miles, with a coast greater than the whole of the United States on the Atlantic and Pacific together, running close up to Asia, with a population variously estimated from fifty to seventy-odd thousand souls, who from the time of its discovery by the Russians, I think in 1741, up to the present have got along pretty well without governmental interference. The Russians, as we know, established trading-houses there and gave power to a great trading corporation, under whose authority the Territory was governed up to the time that we acquired it; and I believe from all I have heard or read about the Territory that those Indians in that severe climate have got along far better than the Indians that have been under the protection and guardianship and care of this Government.

There was a great deal of force in what was said the other day by somebody on the other side of the Chamber with respect to extending our Indian policy to those Indians. I say that if you study the interest of those Indians and of this Government you will let them alone. They have proved for years back that they are capable of taking care of themselves and their tribal relations, and this attempted interference on the part of the Government now to regulate them necessarily will prove unwise.

This Territory is not in the condition of the Territory known as the Indian Territory. Beside that we have a solemn treaty stipulation here, by which we guarantee to the Russian people there the rights of citizens, which provides for their continuance in the Territory. At the time the Territory was acquired the number of Russians and creoles in the Territory was estimated at about 3,000. The number of employés under the control of the Russian company was put at as high as 8,000, all civilized; and the pamphlet to which reference has been made by the Senator from Missouri, and which is on the desk of every Senator, speaking of the Indians in that Territory, says of them, on high authority, that they will compare favorably with any class of immigrants that are daily landed on these shores from European countries. If that be true, I say their condition is not like the condition of the wild Indians of America with whom we are accustomed to deal and for whom we are in the habit of legislating so severely. One high authority has said that the effect of the introduction of brandy into Alaska was to do away with the practice of using a drug there which was regarded as even worse than intoxicating drinks. I do not know how that may be; but I say I do not think it is wise to undertake to legislate on this high plane for these people, and that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is eminently wise to leave a discretionary power somewhere to regulate this matter and qualify the rule of prohibition as circumstances may warrant.

I think we are bound, Mr. President, to give to the people in this Territory some rights. This Government has delayed for sixteen years to do what it was bound to do after we acquired the Territory, to give them some kind of government. It has been delayed.

The Senator from Indiana the other day intimated that I was an enemy of this bill. I am not. I want to know exactly what we are doing, and I think now it would be wise to give some authority either to legislate for these people, to take into consideration their local wants, to adopt reasonable rules of conduct for their Indians, and not to carry into that Territory the entire code of Oregon, which is proposed by this bill, and put it in force and operation over a community to which it may be in no respect adapted. I think if there is anything in the wisdom of legislation it is in accommodating the laws to the condition of the people to whom they apply. There may be circumstances in Alaska that render the application of the Oregon law in many particulars eminently unfit. Still, without knowing what the Oregon law is—and I imagine there are very few Senators here who can tell the outlines of that code—by a few lines in this statute we just put it in force over the entire Territory of Alaska from the confines of Asia down to its southern parts. I do not think that is exactly wise, but still I am not going to antagonize the measure. It may be the best thing we can do just now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Committee on Territories intended in the provision which was reported as section 15 of the bill as it was reported, to avoid, if possible, the discussion of this question as a question of prohibition or license or whatever other phase it may take in the different communities of this country. The statute of the United States, that has been in force for a great many years, gave the President full authority to prohibit absolutely the importation into Alaska of any spirituous liquors. It also authorized him, in line with our legislation upon the Indian question, to prohibit the introduction of fire-arms and ammunition. That was the state of the statute as we found it relating to Alaska when we came to frame this bill, but that discretion did not extend at all to the question of the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors within the Territory, and such a manufacture of a debased and injurious liquor had grown up to some extent in the Territory itself. The committee, therefore, proposed in this fifteenth section to extend the powers of the President over this question so as to enable him to restrain or to regulate or to prohibit, if he pleased, within the Territory the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors. I do not know what regulations, if any, the President of the United States has made under the power which has been lodged in his hands for some years. I do know upon report that there has been very grave and serious troubles originating from the use of intoxicating liquors in the Territory; and so yesterday, when the Senator from Kansas proposed his amendment, I explained somewhat less in detail, but still fully, what I have said to-day as to the position of the committee, and said also for myself that I did not care to antagonize the proposition if the Senate should, as applied to this Territory, as an expedient and temporarily make the prohibition itself. There was no objection, and that amendment was adopted.

Now, Mr. President, while it is true, as the Senator from Missouri says, that Alaska is not an Indian reservation, it is equally true, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, that it is not in the ordinary sense an organized Territory of the United States, even after we have passed this bill. We have no Indian reservations; they have not yet been set apart. If they are to be set apart, we have no provisions there by which we can give the white man any rights with reference to the use or importation or manufacture of spirituous liquors and at the same time save the native populations from the debasing effects of the use of them.

The legislation of this country has for years and from a very early period recognized the fact that it was unsafe for the Indians themselves, unsafe for their white neighbors, that fire-water in the form of any of the spirituous liquors should be introduced among them. We have said so. Now, here is a Territory that is in a condition where we can not discriminate between any white settlers that may temporarily be there and the Indians who reside there. There are no separate bounds as yet for their habitations; they are mingled in towns and villages along that coast; and whatever regulation we make as to the importation or manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors there must be common to both races.

Now, Mr. President, without at all committing ourselves upon the question of prohibition or license as a general proposition applied to such communities as the Senator from Missouri represents or such as I represent here, may we not all agree that, temporarily, seeing the evils and dangers that result, seeing the mixture and intercommingling of these classes of people who inhabit that Territory—may we not agree that for the present and until the white settlements there shall be further developed and until we shall have had the report of the officers of the Territory as to what rules and regulations should be made for it—may we not agree until then at least, without putting at peril any serious interest of any citizen of the Territory of the white race or the Indian race, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory.

Mr. VEST. May I be permitted to ask a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator propose to amend this amendment prohibiting the importation or use of alcoholic stimulants so as to allow it for medicinal purposes?

Mr. HARRISON. I was coming to that in one moment, and I hope to make a suggestion upon which the Senator from Missouri will meet me. It is that that exception shall be incorporated in the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, and that we shall also add the words "that the President of the United States is authorized to make such regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section." I think we can all agree without reference to the differences we may have as applied to such communities as we live in upon the temperance question, or the question of prohibition, that temporarily as applied to this community as it stands now, where nearly its entire population is Indian, which is being debased and destroyed by the use of intoxicating liquors—we may all agree, acting upon the basis of the legislative policy of this country, to keep these fire-waters away from the Indian temporarily. Let this bill stand as now amended with such an amendment as I have suggested, and leave to the President of the United States the formulation of such regulations as may be necessary to carry it out. I ask the Senator from Missouri if that will not meet his concurrence?

Mr. VEST. Why not leave that power to these commissioners?

Mr. HARRISON. I answer the Senator, simply because the commissioners are located in widely separated parts of the Territory, and it seems to me it were better that the power should be lodged in the hands of some one person, so that the regulations for the entire district may be uniform, rather than to lodge it in the hands of four commissioners, who might make different regulations for the different districts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Has the Senator any information as to what regulations the Russian Government had on that subject?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not. I have no information upon that matter. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will not propose, in the proper place, an amendment excepting the use of liquors for medicinal purposes. If he will not, I propose the amendment at the appropriate place in the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, "except for medicinal uses;" and at the end of the section to add the words:

And the President shall make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provision of this section.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Indiana who has charge of this bill whether or not this provision of the Constitution has not some relation to the prohibition which is proposed here. Section 8 of Article I provides that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, * * * but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

It appears to me that the Territory of Alaska is already within the United States, and that a prohibition in one part of the territory of the United States of an impost or excise or duty while there is such a duty or excise or tax in another is not uniform; and in a Territory like Alaska, coming to us under a treaty, paying to us a revenue of $2,000,000 within a few years, with established commercial intercourse with different parts of the world, with a Russian population guaranteed under the treaty the same rights of commercial intercourse that the citizens of the States have, I do not perceive how you can have a uniform duty or impost upon the importation of liquors at one rate in one portion of the territory of the United States and prohibited in another.

The case of the Indian reservations has no relevancy to the one before us. The Government of the United States has always recognized the territorial sovereignty, to a limited extent, of the Indian tribes who inhabit this country. The theory of our sovereignty and that of the governments of the Old World, from which we derived it, has been recognized, but with a qualified recognition, and in the extinction of the Indian title, dating back to a period before the occupation and assertion of territorial sovereignty by European nations on this continent until the present time when that sovereignty was exercised by this country over the Indian tribes, there remained a recognition to them of a reserved right of occupation and a reserved right of government in their tribal capacity; there was the idea of reservations of country in which the Indian governments, by statute, were allowed to prevail. But I apprehend that the case of Alaska, coming to us under the provisions of a treaty guaranteeing to the inhabitants the same commercial rights that the people of this country have, is different. And, with a constitutional provision on our part that duties and imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the territory of the United States, we may not establish a different rate of imposts or duties in Alaska from that existing in other parts of this country; and surely prohibition in one part and admission in another can not be uniformity.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not care to debate the constitutional question, but out of respect to the Senator who has proposed it, I can not see what application the constitutional provision he has cited has to this question. We are not laying duties or imposts here

Certainly the power of the Government over the Territories and over the District of Columbia and over the districts ceded to it for forts and arsenals is absolute upon the question of the manufacture and sale of liquors.

Mr. GARLAND. The question raised by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has been adjudicated by Judge Deady in the district court of Oregon on the constitutionality of section 1955 of the Revised Statutes in the case of the Louisa Simpson, in 2 Sawyer's Reports. He held that it was within the power of Congress to pass such an act and that it was in the power of the President to make the regulation contemplated by that act. I will not detain the Senate by reading the case, but the same point was made there that is now made by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The proposition is a very plain one. The Senator from Indiana will not contend that in the District of Columbia or in the Territories of the United States there may be a different rate of imposts and duties and excises from those laid elsewhere. The language of the Constitution is plain and emphatic. A uniform excise, a uniform duty, is plainly demanded. It can not be different. Prohibition in one place and admission in another with a specific tax can not be uniform. There can be no question, I think, in regard to that.

Mr. PLUMB. I am surpised at the sympathy here for the people of Alaska in regard to the use of liquor. This power has been made use of in regard to the prohibition of the introduction of ammunition and fire-arms. There was no prohibition sentiment as such, no question of the application of prohibition in any unusual way, until it was brought into this debate by the Senator from Missouri. My remarks yesterday in regard to my amendment were simply to the effect that I sought to apply the same rule we had applied before to the Indian tribes. I believe now that rule is wise, and there is no exception practically except such as is necessary to enable the military establishment to carry into the Indian Territory the various medical supplies necessary for the use of the medical department of the Army. That is all the exception that section 2139 is meant to cover and all that ever is covered. I have in mind now an application that has been made recently to the Secretary of War for permission on the part of individuals to carry liquor into the Indian Territory, which has been denied, with the statement that so far as the present incumbent was concerned the power had never been exercised except for the purpose of enabling regular military supplies to go along with the military establishment.

If there is anything in the point the Senator from Florida makes, that these people have got some rights there by reason of the treaty, I think, on the whole, they inhere as fully in the matter of arms and ammunition as they do in regard to liquors. I do not think these people need any more the use of intoxicating liquors than they do in the Indian Territory, and my proposition was simply to put them upon the same footing with other Indians and other Indian tribes. But we are not letting them alone, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] implored us to do; we are interfering with them now in a most material way. If they were left to remain there as Indians freed from intercommunication with whites it would be a different thing, but we are opening the Territory now to the irruption of miners. Not a very large population probably will go there, but some will go, and the contact between the white race and the Indian race has always been followed by the introduction of vices of a certain character which it has been the policy of the law to prevent.

The question now is how much of that we shall do, in what form of words, by what provision of law; and the matter of sentiment which the Senator from Missouri brought in here I think is entirely unnecessary and has nothing to do with the case. It is simply a question of the proper adjustment of our relations with these people in view of the fact that we are establishing certain rules and regulations there which are calculated for the whites, who carry along with them the vices and the disturbances and the disorders which have accompanied heretofore the intermingling between the two races of people.

If the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana can be properly carried out and properly limited, I have no objection to that; but the Senator from Missouri will not find any comfort in that, because he means that there shall be no prohibition whatever, and yet he shelters himself behind a prohibition; he provides that somebody else may prohibit. After vaunting himself on his courage here on this question he is not willing himself to do it, but he says, "I will put up a board of commissioners or somebody else and they may do it, and I will hide behind their skirts while they are doing it!"

Mr. VEST. That is about as fair an argument as we can have on that side of the question. The Secretary of the Interior can permit the introduction of spirits in the Indian Territory, and I think it has been done.

Mr. PLUMB. I referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. VEST. The Secretary of the Interior, on the part of this Government, has control over that Territory explicitly and positively by statute. The Senator from Kansas says he wants to put this Territory on the same footing with other portions of the territory of the United States occupied by Indians. I want that Senator now to point me to one single foot of the territory of the United States where any such prohibition as this ever obtained. He can not find it. Look at the Revised Statutes. I say the Secretary of War or any officer of the Army can give a permit to take intoxicating liquors into any Indian reservation, much less Territory. The Territories regulate that matter by their own Territorial laws; but the Secretary of War, like a second lieutenant of the Army, can send as much liquor as he chooses into any Indian reservation under the provisions of the statutes now.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator has not read with his usual care the final clause of section 2139. It is only such officers as are expressly authorized by the Secretary of War who can do that thing.

Mr. VEST. I say the Secretary of War can give that power to a second lieutenant and does do it. He can give it to any officer of the Army if he pleases. But what does the Senator from Kansas do? He prohibits the importation or the use of alcoholic liquors in Alaska even to save human life. You can not sell them for medicinal purposes, you can not use them in the practice of the profession of medicine. A man may be at the point of death, in articulo mortis, but not one particle of alcohol can be used by any physician under any state of case whatever.

He says I am bringing in here the question of prohibition unnecessarily. Surely not. It was brought in by the Senator from Kansas. It was brought in by this most extraordinary provision, the most stringent ever introduced into the Senate of the United States or into any legislative assembly on this continent. Never in the most extravagant flights of fanaticism did anybody before propose such a provision as this striking at alcohol for medicinal uses, saying that no man should go into the Territory with a flask of brandy in his pocket, no physician, no clergyman even, should take it there in order to alleviate the pangs of that Arctic region. There never before was such an amendment offered, and yet the Senator says I brought in the prohibition question. He offered the most stringent prohibition ever known anywhere.

The Senator from Indiana appealed to me to know if I would not consent to a modification of the amendment permitting the introduction of alcoholic liquors into the Territory of Alaska under the regulations of the President, as I understood him.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand what the Senator says. I can not hear him.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to ask me if I would consent to modify this amendment so that alcoholic liquors might be introduced into Alaska for medicinal purposes under such rules and regulations as the President might prescribe.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir, that was the question.

Mr. VEST. I do not propose to be hypercritical in regard to this bill. I voted for the bill in the Committee on Territories with the section which the Senator from Indiana reported, but the Senator had left this power in the hands of the President, as the Revised Statutes had left it for sixteen years, and I was satisfied with that provision. I am not now convinced against that provision except that since the question has come up, I believe if we are going to establish a local government in any shape or form in the Territory of Alaska, we ought to give to that local government the power of regulating this essentially domestic matter. I believe that if we are about to make a board of commissioners there, that board of commissioners should have the power to say whether alcoholic stimulants should be introduced there for medicinal purposes or otherwise and under what rules and regulations. If the purpose of the committee in reporting this bill is not to give that people local self-government, I am at a loss to know what was the purpose for which the bill was reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, the bill as reported from the Committee on Territories did not confide to any officer of this civil district discretion in reference to this question of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. VEST. I know that.

Mr. HARRISON. It confided it to the President, where we propose to confide it now.

Mr. VEST. And I was satisfied with that provision; but that was stricken out, and the amendment of the Senator from Kansas put in. Now I believe upon reflection and after this debate that this power should be given to the commissioners. I presume they meet as a board.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator misconceives the scope of the bill. They do not meet as a board; they only have the function of commissioners of the circuit court of the United States and of justices of the State of Oregon. They may exercise judicial functions, but there is no provision in the bill for their assembling or meeting as a board on any question.

Mr. VEST. Then, Mr. President, let them regulate this matter as to the respective districts with which they are officially connected. They are the best judges; they are sent there for that purpose. They are given these powers with the distinct design to enable them to judge of the condition of that people and to carry out the laws that we enact.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "district," the words "except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes."

Mr. HARRISON. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] moves to amend the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I accept the amendment without a vote, if the Senate will consent that it may be so, as an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, section 14, after the word "district," it is proposed to insert:

Except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator from Kansas who is to determine the question?

Mr. INGALLS. I would allow the Senator from Florida to determine it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, that will not do.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Florida will allow me to give another answer besides the very satisfactory one which the Senator from Kansas has made, I would say that I have added a provision that the President shall have power to make such regulations as are needed to carry out the section.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Now, if you are attempting to legislate for these people, why not go into the subject of polygamy?

Mr. INGALLS. And slavery, which also exists there.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Slavery and polygamy I believe exist in this Territory under existing usage, I will not say law. I should like to see some wise provision adopted that would have the effect of preserving the morals of the people, although I am free to say that everything that I have read about them is in their favor, and it shows that the Indian population of Alaska to-day, without any Congressional legislation, is in a better position than the Indian population that has been commanding for years the special attention of Congress. Now it is said the whites are going in there to demoralize them. Well, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

What I complain of is that the Indian population of Alaska are to be regarded as in the same situation as the wild Indians with whom we have been in the habit of dealing. Every information on that subject shows that they are entirely a different class. The great majority of the Indians so called in Alaska have an Asiatic origin. They are known as Eskimo. A copper-colored face, black eyes, and shining ivory teeth are qualities of the Indians in Alaska. They are not to be compared with the wild Indians of the Everglades or of the regions of the West. In looking into their history it will be found that they have given the Government of Russia no trouble; that while she ruled that Territory, from 1741 down to 1867, when we acquired it, that Indian population gave to her as little trouble as any other kind of people of the class in the world ever gave to a government.

I am not one of those who believe that it is always wise to keep in motion the legislative power of this Government. I believe with the celebrated Chief-Justice Marshall, as he expressed in his opinion in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, that some subjects are best regulated when they are let alone, and I see very clearly from the indications given out here that we are about to enter upon a policy which after a few years will bring within the jurisdiction of this Government the sixty or seventy thousand Indians of Alaska, hunting Federal corncribs, houses of refuge, stores of supply, and blankets all over that country, and millions of dollars will be called for annually from this Government to meet their wants; a people who up to this time have never asked the Russian Government for a dollar, living in a climate tenfold more severe, where the struggle for life is tenfold harder and more difficult than any region of country occupied by a similar class of people on this continent. And yet that people, thus situated in the ice and snow almost summer and winter, have never had a want provided for by the authority of the government that preceded us in its jurisdiction over them. The authority in that Territory was left to the control of a hard-hearted trading corporation organized at St. Petersburg, that planted itself there and made many of the people slaves in reality; but they toiled and they labored, they wore the skins of wild animals for clothing, they lived on the fish of the seacoast and the berries of the mountain, but they asked no supplies from government. But now, in the very incipiency of the exercise of our authority over that country, the first step that is proposed to be taken is to pass a law on the subject of prohibition under the authority of Congress. It may be wise; it may be that the miners, to the introduction of whom this bill looks, may demoralize these people; but I say that the history of the Indians of Alaska is an instructive one to this Government, and that it ought not to be ignored. It shows that nature, even in so barren regions as that, does not absolutely disinherit her children.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In that same connection, and as part of the original amendment as I offered it, there is another clause, to come at the end of the section. I do not know whether the Secretary has it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the section:

And the President of the United States shall make such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. I offer the following amendment: After the word "dollars," in the fourteenth line of section 9, insert:

And in addition the sum of $1,000 per annum during the time he may perform the duties of surveyor-general.

So as to read:

The marshal the sum of $2,000, and in addition, the sum of $1,000 per annum during the time he may perform the duties of surveyor-general.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think this addition to the salary is justified. This officer has fees, and will have some, I suppose, in the new duties which are ex officio devolved upon him; and it seems to me the increase is not necessary. After all, the work of surveying is not to be done by him, but there is submitted to him simply the duty under the statute of designating a mineral surveyor, who makes the survey at the expense of the parties for whom the work is done.

Mr. BOWEN. I will simply say that the surveyor-general's duties, whatever they are, are devolved upon the marshal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. There are one or two other amendments pending, which I hope the Secretary will report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

The CHIEF CLERK. At the close of section 8 it is proposed to add:

And provided also, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause such surveys as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section to be made.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that amendment ought to be adopted. We ought to have no surveys at all of any lands in the Territory with a view of establishing the rights of any individuals there until we have first had from the officers who are to be appointed under the bill the preliminary report which they are to make. I do not think we ought to adopt this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I offer the following amendment. Section 9, line 31, after the word "judge," insert:

That all officers appointed for said Territory, before entering upon the duties of their offices, shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable to said Territory are hereby extended thereto.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida to accept a change or two in that amendment which he has proposed, and the first is that the word "Territory," in the first line of his amendment, be changed to "district," as this geographical subdivision is called throughout the bill a civil district. The second is that instead of saying they "shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States" he shall say they "shall take the oath required by law." The third is in the next clause, "and the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable to said district and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby extended thereto," to add:

But there shall be no legislative assembly in said district, nor shall any Delegate in Congress be sent therefrom.

I think that covers all the Senator wants.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. My amendment does not provide anything about a Delegate.

Mr. HARRISON. I know.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Florida whether he supposes he can extend the Constitution of the United States to a Territory by act of Congress?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, it is the only way it can be done.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it extended itself.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, it does not. I beg leave to differ from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I was trying to avoid a controversy which I thought would be somewhat wide if we entered upon it. I hope the Senator from Florida will accept the modifications I have suggested.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I see no substantial difference, and I accept the Senator's amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state them so that the Secretary can get them. In the first line of the Senator's amendment I propose to strike out "Territory" and insert "district;" then, in line 5, to strike out the word "Territory" and insert "district;" and after the word "district" to insert these words, "and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act;" and then at the end of the amendment to add, "but there shall be no legislative assembly in said district, nor shall any Delegate in Congress be sent therefrom."

Mr. INGALLS. Now may we hear the amendment read as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I presume the Senator means to refer to "the oath required by law."

Mr. HARRISON. I should have added that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Being the oath prescribed in the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Instead of saying "take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States," say "take the oaths required by law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That all officers appointed for said district, before entering upon the duties of their offices, shall take the oaths required by law; and the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable to said district, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended thereto; but there shall be no legislative assembly in said district, nor shall any Delegate be sent to Congress therefrom.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "the Constitution and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. It does not seem to me that we could put into language a more absurd provision than to say that the Constitution of the United States not locally inapplicable is extended by an act of Congress to a portion of the territory of the United States, which the present amendment as it is phrased does.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, Mr. President, it only shows that great minds will differ. I do not speak of myself, but of the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts and the mind of Mr. Webster. I would remind the Senator that in the great controversy——

Mr. HOAR. On the contrary, Mr. Webster declined even to extend the laws of God to a Territory.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I remember the debate on that subject, and I think I have authority for saying almost in the language of my amendment that there is no way in which the Constitution of the United States or the general laws thereof can find their way into a Territory except by the action of Congress. That is just what this amendment proposes to do so far as it can do it consistently with the provisions of this bill.

As I said in the debate yesterday, the Constitution was not made for the Territories, it was made for the States of this Union, and it is upon that ground that I have found myself at full liberty to support the measures hitherto reported by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] with regard to Utah, and I never felt myself in the least embarrassed by any argument made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia before me [Mr. BROWN] on that subject, because I feel that when this Congressional authority was legislating for a Territory it had all the power over it that the people in their organic capacity possess in a State, and that the Constitution of the United States does not operate in the Territories unless expressly extended there by the positive provisions of an act of Congress. The distinction between the Territories and the States is plain on this point. A citizen of a Territory, as we know, can not sue in a court of the United States under that clause giving jurisdiction to a citizen of one State to sue a citizen of another in the United States courts. He has no such constitutional right. The Constitution of the United States allows a citizen of one State to sue a citizen of another State in a United States court; but a citizen of a Territory can not do it. This has been the accepted theory as I understand. I want as far as I can to give to these people under the provisions of the treaty the benefit of our organic law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. HOAR. The amendment of the Senator from Florida provides that the Constitution of the United States so far as the same is not locally inapplicable shall extend to this Territory. I move to strike that out. That is the whole of it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say "the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—ayes 28, noes not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let it be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. As amended the amendment reads:

That all officers appointed for said district, before entering upon the duties of their offices, shall take the oaths required by law; and the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable to said district, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended thereto; but there shall be no legislative assembly in said district, nor shall any Delegate be sent to Congress therefrom.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Now, we can understand exactly the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts in moving to strike out that portion of my amendment relating to the Constitution of the United States. I would say to him that the language I adopted was the language that has been adopted in nearly all the organic laws of the Territories of the Union. As to Florida, I can cite the law—I copied it—that the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable to the Territory were to be thereby extended. That was the purport of my amendment; and whether the Senator made a mere technical objection whether the Constitution could be severed or not is for him to say. My amendment related to the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, and not to the Constitution in that regard. It was not open to his mere grammatical criticism. If he thought there was any point in that, the language of my amendment was clearly and distinctly written, and written in the way that has been usual in such cases. In adopting a sentence of that kind I could not see any objection to the language that the Constitution and laws of the United States not locally inapplicable should be in force in that Territory. Now the Senator by his amendment has stricken out the Constitution; he can have it that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. There are no further pending amendments, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer an amendment in section 9, to strike out, in lines 10 and 11, the words "and in addition thereto," and to insert "which fees shall be reported to the Attorney-General and paid into the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. HARRISON. Let the Senator read it as it will appear.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir. The compensation is fixed for the officers mentioned here, to be appointed by the President, and who are to hold their respective offices for the term of four years.

They shall severally receive the fees of office established by law for the several offices the duties of which have been hereby conferred upon them, as the same are determined and allowed in respect of similar offices under the laws of the United States, and in addition thereto—which fees shall be reported to the Attorney-General and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

I propose to leave out "in addition thereto" and insert:

Then in line 11, before the word "shall," to insert "they." The purpose of the amendment is that here on the very outskirts we shall seek to do that which, if the Senate have not intended to do, a very large proportion of them have been very strongly in favor of doing, and which the Attorney-General recommends shall be done throughout the United States. He recommends that marshals and that class of officers shall not be allowed to receive fees, but shall receive a salary. That has been recognized and acknowledged, and by examinations made by the Attorney-General into the marshals' offices in the different States in this Union he has been led to denounce the fee system most bitterly. If the Senate will indulge me a moment, I will read from the report of the Attorney-General a few lines which show the injustice of the course of officers of this kind far more strongly than I can put it:

The practice of compensating the United States marshal by fees is an expensive one. Examiners of the Department of Justice who have been detailed to examine their accounts report that, in order to make the maximum fees of the office $6,000 per annum, unscrupulous marshals in some instances, through their deputies, have encouraged frivolous prosecutions, outraging the rights of citizens, and involving the United States in unnecessary and excessive expenses. It is estimated that it costs the Government ten dollars expenses for every dollar's emoluments of the marshal. Thus it will appear that it would be to the interest of the Government to give the marshal a fixed compensation, so as to remove all inducements to practice frauds upon the Government on the one hand or wrongs upon the citizen on the other. If the deputy were to be paid fees for executing process, it would insure the same efficiency as the present fee system, and at the same time relieve the Department of the extraordinary expense complained of, as the marshal would have no interest in encouraging such practices.

If that be true in the older States, and it is entirely proved from an examination by the inspectors of the Attorney-General, and it is probably true within the knowledge of nearly every Senator on this floor, it will be far worse in Alaska, a Territory so distant from us as to be outside of the personal inspection, to a very great extent, of the inspecting officers of this Department. To place three or four officers in command of that Territory and give them a license which will be unchecked and uncontrolled to a very great extent to collect fees for themselves will lead to greater abuse than has been reported to us by the Attorney-General. If they are to go there with this power they will encourage litigation unjustly, as it is said such officers do in many of the States. They may greatly encourage litigation, to the annoyance of the people and make the execution of the law odious, as they have done in very many of the States of the Union, not only South but North and not only North but West. In that way they will do an injustice to the people, because here is proof of it, and they will do great injustice to the Government. If the salary fixed here be not enough for the officers named, let it be increased; but I desire that part of the section which allows the receiving of fees as part of their compensation to be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I have nothing to say about this amendment, but I want to say just a word in reply to what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts not now in his seat.

Mr. HARRISON. I raise the point of relevancy.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not confined to any particular question.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe the Senator is right.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was obvious from the tone and manner of the Senator from Massachusetts that he characterized my amendment as little less than absurd—the idea of carrying the Constitution into the Territories by an act of Congress. I said to him that that was the language usually adopted in all the organic laws of the Territories, and that it could be found in the body of laws known as the Revised Statutes. The little play that he made upon the words was not up to the standard that he ought to pursue. He thought that my language contemplated the provisions of the Constitution and that it was grammatically incorrect, and he brought forth his amendment and it was carried by his friends on that side of the Chamber, and I imagine that his purpose was to prevent the Constitution of the United States from having any operation in this Territory.

I said in my place in the Senate yesterday that it was no part of the purpose of this bill to give effect to the organic law of the United States. Now I will read that provision of the Revised Statutes relating to the Territories, almost in the very words I employed in my amendment, and it can be found in nearly all the organic laws providing for the organization of the Territories of the Union. Section 1891 reads as follows:

> The Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories, and in every Territory hereafter organized, as elsewhere within the United States.

Now, I do not suppose that the compilers of this great code contemplated the use of any surplusage, as we lawyers term it; and if the Constitution, as the Senator suggests, operates within the Territories without any legislation, this provision was entirely unnecessary; but, finding this provision in the Revised Statutes, and finding a like provision in the organic law of nearly every Territory that has been organized under the authority of this Government, and knowing, as I knew, that it was not anything that this title relating to the Territories should operate in Alaska, I felt justified in bringing up the amendment and proposing to extend the Constitution and the laws of the United States to that Territory as far as those laws could apply. The language was clear; the purpose was obvious; there was no disguise about it. But the Senator from Massachusetts got up in his place and deliberately moved, in the face of this provision of the Revised Statutes showing that my amendment was necessary to accomplish the end, to have the word "Constitution" stricken out, so that the people of that Territory, notwithstanding the treaty made with Russia, which stipulates in their behalf that they shall enjoy the privileges of American citizens in their property, their lives, and their liberty, are not to have the benefit of the Constitution in that Territory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the recommendation of the Attorney-General and with the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska that it would be much better if all these officers were put upon the basis of a fixed annual salary; but we have not yet adopted that as the law in relation to similar officers to those constituted by this bill, and I do not think this is a good place to inaugurate it. I am free to say to the Senate that the committee were very much at a loss to know what salaries to fix for these offices which are created in the Territory of Alaska. It will be very expensive to get there; the cost of traveling from any place in this country to the place where one's official functions are to be discharged will be very expensive. We do not know what the expense of living there may be; so it was very difficult to agree in advance what would be a reasonable compensation for these several officers. We have fixed $2,000 for the marshal, striking off $500 which was provided as the bill was introduced, and allowed fees under the laws as they exist in relation to similar officers in the States. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that we leave this bill as it is until these matters now in doubt shall have been demonstrated as to what is a fair compensation for the officers who are to serve us in these capacities in that Territory, and that he limit his amendment, if that is needed at all, to a provision requiring them to report under oath to the Attorney-General the amount of fees received by them. Then when the first report comes in at the end of the first year we shall be advised of the amount of fees thus received, and will have that intelligent information which will enable us to fix their salaries with relation to their fees or to abolish fees altogether and give them a stated salary.

I suggest, therefore, that this amendment be not agreed to, as this bill is experimental, and as it is to be developed by the experience of a year there what can be done under it? I hope the Senator will defer this provision until we have general legislation upon the subject or at least until the end of one year.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, there would seem in the suggestion of the Senator to be no reasonable difficulty in the way of establishing the compensation by a fixed salary. The governor is to receive no fees which he can appropriate to himself, I take it, but the bill fixes the governor's salary, and there seems to be no difficulty in making a calculation as to the expense of reaching Alaska, and the expense of subsistence after he reaches there, because he is not to receive any fees, and it is as easy to fix the compensation of the marshal and of the district attorney at a stated salary as to fix it for the governor of the Territory.

I knew that the Senator would concede the necessity of making this reformation; it is demanded all over this broad land that this reformation should be made. There are cases in the different States where citizens have been subjected to outrages by reason of the cupidity of men clothed with a little brief authority who wanted to add to the amount of their compensation. It has, as I said before, reached all sections of this Union, and honest homesteaders in the West have been dragged from their homes under the pretense of cutting a stick of timber which they needed for firewood, in order that a marshal might have fees for serving process and an attorney for commencing suit. Under the internal-revenue laws outrages have been perpetrated and committed upon citizens who were not intending to violate, and did not violate the law, solely that gentlemen clothed with authority might be able to wring from honest citizens a compensation which did not properly belong to them. That has become a growing and a crying outrage in this land, so much so that the Attorney-General has thrown all the possible force of the administration of his office, first, into the examination of these outrages, and then into a brief and elegant recital as to the necessity of a reform, not only to protect the citizen but to protect the Government, for he says that every dollar that is added to the compensation of an officer costs the Government ten. When you submit the 400 whites and the 1,500 half-breeds and the 30,000 Indians in the Territory of Alaska who are living now comparatively peacefully and indulging in the rites of Christianity, as this report says—when you put them in the hands of a Federal ring of six or eight men, with nothing to hold them in check but their avarice and cupidity, which even in the surroundings of the law's strong arms can not be held in check, we are doing that people an injustice. If this system be wrong, and it is impossible for the United States to correct it in all the States, at least we have power to protect that handful of whites and those Indians there from introducing upon them a mess—although it may be small—of office-holders who may fasten their clutches upon them, either to wring out the subsistence of their honest earnings or to arraign one citizen against another.

I am glad to see that the chairman of this committee is really in favor of this proposition, and I again repeat that it is as competent and as easy to fix the salary of the marshal and the district attorney as it is to fix the salary of the governor of the Territory.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I do not think it is probable the Senate will complete the consideration of this bill this evening, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I think it is entirely practicable for us to complete the consideration of this bill within a few minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator insists on it, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will do so. This amendment and one more are all I know of.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur in the proposition made by the Senator from Nebraska about the necessity of changing our judicial system so as to compensate the clerks, marshals, and commissioners by salaries rather than by fees, and I am afraid we shall not possibly reach the bill to which the Senator from Indiana refers, providing a general system for the control of these officers in the particulars to which I allude. The evils are visited upon every part of this country, and they are very serious. They have provoked the people in some parts of the United States almost beyond measure. The Attorney-General has made a very diligent research through his special agents and other employés into this abuse, and has made representations to Congress which ought to demand our immediate attention, for we find that these officers who are put among the people for the administration of justice are not only abusing that administration, but are scandalizing the administration of justice itself and the very name of the law itself and of courts of justice by their procedure in the matter of charging up fees against the people and making occasion to get a chance to charge fees.

As long as I am a member of this body I will never vote for any bill of this kind that does not contain this provision. I intend by my vote to meet it every time it comes up, and I hope that the chairman of this committee will find himself entirely authorized to accept the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. It is a sensible amendment, and it is just as easy, as he remarked, to fix the salary of a marshal or of any other officer in the Territory of Alaska as it is to fix the salary or compensation of the governor. Let us remove this temptation away from these men; let us begin now and at least set to ourselves a good example that we shall follow hereafter when a general bill comes up. Let us dispose of this matter as we go along with it, and so provide in this bill as that the officers connected with the administration of justice shall have a fixed salary, and shall not any longer be tempted to commit the abuses and outrages of which the whole country is complaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. FRYE. What does that leave the salary?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The governor $3,000, and the other officers at $2,000.

Mr. FRYE. That can not be sufficient.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is competent for the committee to amend by increasing the salaries. I only want the salaries fixed.

The question being put on the amendment, there were on a division—ayes 29, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRISON. I am satisfied we have a quorum of Senators present, either here or in the cloak-rooms.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the Chair count the Senators present, without the necessity of calling the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no doubt a quorum is present.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that by unanimous consent there may be a recount.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the vote be taken again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the vote will be retaken.

The question being again put, the ayes were 32.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe a majority of the Senate is in favor of the proposition; I will not contend further about it. It makes necessary at once some amendment which I shall propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose, Mr. President—I do not know whether we can get at it in an orderly fashion, the committee having reduced the salaries proposed by the original bill——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would suggest to the Senator that if my amendment disarranges the ideas of the committee as to the amount of the salary it will be competent for the committee to give that matter consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. It would only be competent for the committee to do it by recommitting the bill, which we desire to avoid. It is not advisable at this stage of it to do that.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana, as it becomes necessary for him to prepare an amendment fixing the salaries, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and we can finish this matter to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I have been afraid, as the consideration of this bill has protracted itself for some days, that the Senate would become impatient of its consideration. It is not a matter of my own convenience at all, and I am willing to defer, in this respect, to the wishes of the Senate; but I do not like to be holding the attention of the Senate so long upon this bill if it can be avoided. I think by restoring the salary of these officers to $2,500, as proposed by the original bill, that would be sufficient to start with; but in that event we should have to increase largely the salaries of the commissioners, who are given a very small salary, whose compensation was to be largely from fees, and also to make some provision as to whether the fees which are earned under the State law of Oregon, which is put in force, are also to be included or whether these officers are only to report such fees as accrue to them under the laws of the United States. These questions are involved. As to a motion to adjourn or to go into executive session, I am willing to defer to the wishes of the Senate in regard to it.

Mr. HARRIS. With that conditional assent of the Senator from Indiana, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to offer an amendment, that it may be printed, to come up for consideration to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks consent to offer an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. It is to be printed merely, I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, with the permission of the Senator from Tennessee, I simply desire to say that I hope no Senator will feel that I have been neglectful about pressing this bill to consideration and we shall have no complaints if it occupies another day.

Mr. HARRIS. I am sure no Senator can so feel in view of the energy the Senator from Indiana has exhibited on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

REMAINS OF GENERAL ORD.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the motion is put I ask—if there is any objection to it I shall withdraw the request—to have the bill, which was laid on the table this morning, to remove the remains of Major-General Ord from Cuba to Washington city taken up and passed. I think there will be no objection to it whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. If business intervenes between the consideration of the bill that we have had up and the adjournment, I ask that before there is an executive session it may be again laid before the Senate, so that it shall not lose its place by any technical rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the unfinished business is not to lose its place. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take up the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C. It directs the Secretary of War to cause the remains of the late Major-General Ord to be transported from Havana to Washington, and to pay the necessary expense of the transportation and interment of the remains out of the appropriation for contingencies of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill 153, in relation to Alaska, is now before the Senate. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAWLEY. Pending which I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope not.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope we shall agree to this motion, and I will give my reasons. The Senate has been in session a much greater number of hours I think than usual since the holidays, and I am sure that many Senators feel as I do that their committee work is being neglected. I should like a day or two in order to catch up. I say that for myself, and I believe there are others in the same condition. I therefore make the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. We have nearly completed one-third, as it is now the 24th of January, of the proper time for a long session of Congress, and we have made very little progress. There are plenty of measures upon the Calendar which are ready and matured for the consideration of the Senate on which the country expects action; and now anything reported from a committee by my friend from Connecticut to-day would not be reached in the order of the Calendar for a great many weeks. There is no hurry, therefore, whether such measures come in on Monday or Tuesday. It does seem to me that to give two of the legislative days of every week to committee work when we have so much legislative work ready is a great waste, and we shall have to pay for it after midsummer. I hope we shall finish this Alaska bill to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I unite in that hope. I trust the Senate will be in session to-morrow and finish the Alaska bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 23, noes 24.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I insist on my motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I would ask the Senator from Tennessee to yield for a moment. I desire to ask that the bill pending be printed as amended, so that it may be upon our desks in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that order? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 11 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 24, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BRAINERD, for to-day.

LEGISLATIVE HALLS, ETC., NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from Hon. M. W. Joslyn, Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the secretary of New Mexico, submitting an estimate for repairs to legislative halls and committee-rooms, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ASSIGNMENT OF ROOMS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the letter of the Clerk of the House of January 23, instant, in relation to the necessity for supplying rooms to the enrolling and other clerks now occupying a room which has been assigned by the House to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, beg leave to report:

That your committee, after a full examination and personal inspection of every available space in the south wing of the Capitol, have unanimously arrived at the conclusion that the only solution of the difficulty consists in the following arrangements:

That the enrolling and other clerks in above-named room be assigned to the rooms now occupied by the stationery clerks and that department; that the stationery clerk and assistants, and property in their charge, be removed to the rooms now occupied by the superintendent of the clerks' document-room, and that the room opposite the room of the Committee on Agriculture, now occupied as a lumber-room by the Doorkeeper, be assigned as a store-room for stationery; and that the superintendent of the clerks' document-room and clerks therein be removed to the room now occupied by the Doorkeeper as an office; and that the room occupied by the War Department records, ordered vacated by the House, be assigned to the Clerk of the House for filing and storage of documents, which will have to be removed to make room for the stationery department.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to carry out the above arrangement; and that all necessary expenses incurred in making these changes and removals and for constructing shelving and cases and caring for the public property and for furnishing the new offices be paid out of the contingent fund of the House under the direction of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to say to the House that we found considerable difficulty in making a suitable arrangement such as would furnish sufficient accommodations for the enrolling clerk and other clerks now in the enrolling-room, and at the same time have them in close proximity to the members of the House. That was deemed important by all the members we consulted and by the Clerk himself.

The arrangement recommended by the committee seems to be entirely satisfactory to the Clerk of the House, to the Doorkeeper, and to all the persons who are affected in any way by the changes. It will furnish, we think, sufficient accommodations for the enrolling clerk and other clerks in his room in the room that is now occupied by the stationery department, which is adjoining to the room of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The stationery department will be removed to the rooms now occupied by the superintendent of the clerks' document-room at the west entrance on the floor below. The superintendent of the clerks' document-room will remove his office to the room near the elevator, now occupied by the Doorkeeper as an office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Downstairs?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir. The Doorkeeper will remove his office to the office of the superintendent of the folding department.

The room below in the basement, which will be vacated under the resolution passed by the House requesting the Secretary of War to transfer the records now kept there to the War Department or other safe place, will be used by the Doorkeeper for storage purposes. The small room just opposite the room occupied by the Committee on Agriculture, now occupied as a storage-room by the Doorkeeper, will be used by the stationery department.

This arrangement, the committee think, will give sufficient accommodations to the Doorkeeper, to the Clerk, and to all the other employés.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is satisfactory to all the departments of the House?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It is satisfactory, as I understand, to the Clerk, the Doorkeeper, and all concerned.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire if I correctly understand the report as respects the room for the enrolling clerks, which is the point that seems to me the most important. Are those clerks to have the room on this floor that is now occupied by the stationery department?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. Just off the old Hall of the House of Representatives?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir, that is the arrangement; and the Committee on Enrolled Bills have the adjoining room, which will be very convenient, as everybody must know.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There was so much confusion in the Hall while the resolution was being read that I think few members heard it in its entirety. I ask that it be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution itself does not explain the matter sufficiently. If there be no objection the whole report with the accompanying resolution will be again read.

There was no objection, and the report and the resolution were again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Indiana what will be the probable expense of these changes? Has any estimate been made?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania it was impossible to make any precise estimate. There will have to be some shelving transferred perhaps to the present stationery-room and the shelving of that department will have to be transferred to another room.

Mr. YOUNG. I understand the changes will cost in all about $200.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I trust as it will not cost much to make this arrangement, and as it seems to be satisfactory to everybody concerned, the House will agree to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES FOR PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. EATON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 25, to fix the day for the meeting of electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for reference to the Select Committee on the Law respecting Election of President and Vice-President.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred accordingly.

PENSIONS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3953) to abolish all distinctions in the pension laws on account of rank in the service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HARDIE HOGAN HELFER.

Mr. YORK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3954) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helfer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FOLEY.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3955) for the relief of John Foley; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill should be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. This bill requires no appropriation; it simply authorizes the Postmaster-General to credit the applicant with certain moneys overpaid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rules it should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I desire that it shall go to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and will make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was referred accordingly, and ordered to be printed.

GLOUCESTER CUSTOMS DISTRICT.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

L. R. WORTHAM.

Mr. HEMPHILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3957) to vest the Court of Claims with jurisdiction to consider and determine the claim of the personal representatives of L. R. Wortham, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARY BULLOCK.

Mr. HARDEMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3958) for the relief of Mary Bullock; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BETSEY CRANDALL.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3959) granting an increase of pension to Betsey Crandall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. SUMNER, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3960) to increase the efficiency of the Signal Service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION TO THE HALL.

Mr. BEACH. I ask consent for the present consideration of a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] states that it is a privileged resolution. It will be read, and the Chair will then determine that question, and if it be not a privileged resolution, will ask for objections to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to keep the doors closed to those not entitled to the privilege of the floor for ten minutes after each adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a privileged matter, as it relates to the proper conduct of the business of the House.

Mr. BEACH. I will state briefly the object of the resolution. It is to prevent the confusion, annoyance, and discomfort to which members are now subjected upon every adjournment of this House. The moment that the doors are open outsiders rush in here, choking up the entrances and aisles and passage ways so that it is almost impossible for members to get out of this Chamber.

The resolution simply provides that the doors shall be kept closed for ten minutes, until members have an opportunity to get out of the Hall. I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. NUTTING. I move to amend the resolution so as to make the time twenty minutes instead of ten; ten minutes is too short a time.

Mr. BUCKNER. The resolution should provide that the doors be closed to the entrance of outsiders, not that they should be kept closed.

Mr. BEACH. If the gentleman had heard the resolution read, he would have seen that it provides that the doors shall be closed for ten minutes after each adjournment to those not entitled to the privileges of the floor.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to make the time five minutes. I sympathize with the object of the resolution of the gentleman from New York, but as it seems to be designed to enable members to escape from the Hall before the outside public can get at them, I think five minutes is enough. That will enable any member to put on his overcoat and leave the Hall.

Mr. KASSON. Do not quarrel about five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There may be persons outside the Hall or in the galleries whom we may want to see at once.

Mr. BEACH. My answer to that is that it will be much easier for any member to go outside and see his visitors than it will be to allow all the visitors to come in here immediately upon adjournment and block up the doors and passage ways of the Hall.

Mr. KASSON. That is so.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], to insert "five minutes" instead of "twenty minutes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. NUTTING, to insert "twenty minutes" instead of "five minutes," was not agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. BEACH was then adopted.

Mr. BEACH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back with a favorable recommendation the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report as early as practicable on the necessity of making immediate appropriations for continuing work on important river and harbor improvements until the appropriation for the next fiscal year becomes available, and to make such recommendations as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of the Government.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the Chair will proceed to call the committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does not the unfinished business coming over from yesterday take precedence?

The SPEAKER. That will come up after the morning hour. The regular order now is the call of committees.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 745) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GULF, COLORADO AND SANTA FÉ RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WELLBORN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill 1576, a bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1339) to enlarge the appropriation for the public building at Pittsburgh; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1484) for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUGUSTA, ME.

Mr. MILLIKEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 702) for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JURORS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3346) to amend section 819 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and regulate the standing of jurors to the foot of the panel; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the Committee on Pensions, reported, as a substitute for House bill 26, a bill (H. R. 3962) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SERGT. A. B. VAN HEUSEN.

Mr. KASSON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for joint resolution 90, a joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector at the port of New York to deliver, free of duty, a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen, as a member of the American rifle team at Wimbledon, in July, 1883; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that this resolution be placed on the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution proposes to remit duties, and in the opinion of the Chair should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KASSON. It does not propose to refund anything.

The SPEAKER. But to remit.

Mr. KASSON. To deliver a certain article free of duty.

Mr. KELLEY. It should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SPEEDY DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees being concluded, the regular order is the unfinished business under consideration at the adjournment yesterday. The question is, Will the House agree to the recommendation to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to strike out the enacting clause of the bill (H. R. 1071) to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters at free-delivery offices and a special stamp to secure said delivery?

Mr. COSGROVE. I move that the bill with the amendments be recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The motion of Mr. COSGROVE was agreed to; there being—ayes 134, noes 24.

STATISTICS RELATING TO CUSTOMS DISTRICTS, ETC.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means; and in this connection I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. The matter which I propose to report back is a resolution of inquiry, and the question has been raised in the committee whether or not it is necessary to accompany such a resolution with a report in writing, as is usual in other cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the rule does require resolutions of inquiry when reported back shall be accompanied by reports in writing. The Chair will cause the rule to be read and the gentleman from Georgia will see it is very comprehensive.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom, for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider; and all bills, petitions, memorials, or resolutions reported from a committee shall be accompanied by reports in writing, which shall be printed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have so thought, and merely raise the question so as to have a ruling of the Chair and to have the matter settled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor to submit a privileged report.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House a tabulated statement showing the number of customs collection districts in each State and Territory of the United States and in the District of Columbia, the number of officers and employés in each district, their rank and pay, the amount of revenue collected in each district and the amount of fees and perquisites, the number of custom-houses and their cost of construction, and the cost of collection in each district of the revenue from such customs duties. Also, the number of internal-revenue districts in each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, the number of officers and employés in each district, with their respective rank and pay, the amount of revenue collected in each district from each source, the amount paid out for rents for buildings, and the costs of collecting the internal-revenue tax in each district.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR AMERICAN LEGATIONS.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 125) to provide each of the American legations abroad with one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING ADDITIONAL NUMBERS.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the rules be amended by the adoption of the following:

"Motions to print additional numbers of any bill, report, resolution or other public document shall be referred to the Committee on Printing, and when the committee shall report in favor of printing additional numbers, the report shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof, and when the cost of printing such additional numbers shall exceed the sum of $500, the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary for the order to print the same."

SPEECHES NOT DELIVERED.

Mr. SCALES also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by the adoption of the following rule:

"That no speech printed by consent of the House in the RECORD, but not delivered, shall exceed one column in the RECORD."

ENCOURAGEMENT OF AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3963) for the encouragement of the American merchant marine; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY TO PAY TOBACCO-TAX REBATE, ETC.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and I further move that all other bills be passed over for the purpose of reaching that appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. BURNES. I also moved that all other bills be passed over for the purpose of reaching that deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the question, that the gentleman moves to go into committee for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which he has indicated.

Under the practice of the House heretofore established these deficiency bills have been treated as though they were general appropriation bills. The Chair perhaps would not so decide if it were an original question, but conforming to the practice the Chair states the question, Will the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill indicated?

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The bill was read.

Mr. BURNES. I ask that the Clerk read the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the bill making appropriations supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, submit the following report in explanation thereof:

The total amount recommended to be appropriated by the bill being $3,771,965. Of this sum, $3,750,000 is to pay audited claims for rebate of tax on tobacco, as provided by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal revenue taxation, and for other purposes." The sum recommended being the amount that it is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as necessary to pay these claims.

The letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is printed herewith.

The sum of $21,965 is recommended to meet the expenses of a session of the Legislature of New Mexico to be held on the third Monday in February, 1884.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior and telegram from the governor of New Mexico are printed herewith in explanation of this appropriation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 5, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 2d instant, requesting an examination and report on House bills 650 and 733 for the appropriation of money for the payment of the rebate of taxes on tobacco allowed by the act of March 3, 1883, I have the honor to transmit herewith a report made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on the 28th ultimo, upon the subject, which receives my approval.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, December 28, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of House bill No. 650, entitled "A bill to carry out the provisions of section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco;" also copies of House bill No. 733, and Senate bill No. 771, all introduced, it appears, for the same purpose.

I would suggest the propriety of calling the attention of the respective Committees on Appropriations to the following points:

The amount—$3,586,549.55—named in these bills and in my annual report will not suffice for payment of all the claims. Additional claims have been received since my annual report was made up and others may be received. I would therefore suggest that the appropriation be fixed at a round sum of $3,750,000.

With the substitution of that sum in House bill No. 650, or in Senate bill No. 771, those bills would appear to be well calculated to give the designed effect to the provisions of section 4, act of March 3, 1883.

* * * * * * *

WALTER EVANS, Commissioner.

Hon. CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 8, 1884.

SIR: I inclose a telegram from the Governor of New Mexico, stating that the members-elect of the Territorial Legislature are assembled and ready to commence a session, but that no provision has been made for the payment of their expenses, and urging that an appropriation for the purpose be made immediately. I beg the attention of your committee to the matter.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

SANTA FÉ, N. MEX., January 7, 1884.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.:

The members-elect of the Legislature are here ready to commence a session, but no appropriation has been made for expenses. I respectfully urge that Congress make the appropriation immediately.

L. A. SHELDON, Governor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to have some explanation in reference to a provision in this bill declaring who are the legal members of the Legislative Assembly of one of the Territories. I notice there is such a provision in this bill, and would be glad to have some explanation of its purport.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, it has not escaped the attention of members on this floor that the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations is a substitute for several other bills which have been introduced from time to time during the present session to supply deficiencies caused by the failure of the last Congress to make appropriations for obligations payable during the fiscal year. This bill, following the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883, provides that the reduction in the tax upon tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, and the like shall inure to the benefit of the holder of such commodities who, having paid the tax under the provisions of the internal-revenue laws, were placed in competition with those who on the 1st day of May had paid one-half of the tax. That was doubtless a wise provision of the law; but whether it was wise or not, it was an obligation created by the Government, and one that must be provided for as deficiences are ordinarily provided for. The Committee on Appropriations have therefore unanimously, in accordance with the request of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, reported this bill, and have instructed me to ask that the House will give it favorable consideration.

In so far as the appropriation for the payment of the Territorial Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico is concerned, and in further consideration of the question with regard to the rebate of the tax upon tobacco, cigars, snuff, &c., I now yield the floor to my esteemed colleague on the committee, Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana, who will explain the subject fully.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention or my desire to speak upon the first appropriation provided for in this bill, namely, the appropriation for the purpose of paying the rebate upon tobacco, snuff, cigars, &c., to the holders of such commodities. I shall confine my remarks entirely to that part of the bill having reference to the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico and providing compensation for its members.

By the organic act of Congress, the act organizing this Territory, among other things it was provided that a Legislature should be elected by the people of the Territory, whose session should not exceed forty legislative days in any one year. The compensation of the members of the Territorial Legislature was also fixed by that act. Afterward the Legislature of that Territory fixed by Territorial enactment the sessions of the Legislature, providing that they should be biennial. This remained the law up to the year 1882, the legislative sessions occurring in the even years, that is to say, 1876, 1878, &c.

In 1882 the Territorial Legislature attempted to change the time from even to odd years for the meeting of the Legislature. They therefore passed a law providing that the next legislative session should be in February, 1883.

That would be one year from its previous meeting in 1882. Congress for some reason—certain reasons have been expressed both to the committee and in the public press—failed to make the appropriation to carry out the Territorial law.

I may stop here to say that from time immemorial—if you can use that term in reference to a country existing for so short a period of time as ours has existed—it has been the recognized doctrine of the country that where there is no adverse or affirmative legislation by Congress setting aside the laws passed by the Territorial Legislature such laws are assumed to be in force and binding upon the people. Now, here was a failure to make an appropriation by the last Congress——

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend permit me just there a suggestion?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The failure of the last Congress to make an appropriation for this Legislature, it is but just to the Committee on Appropriations as well as to the last House to say, was for the reason that no estimates were submitted for the expense of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico. The reason is obvious: they had attempted themselves to change the time of holding the sessions of the Legislature without any ratification of the time by Congress, and now for the first time that change is to be recognized and an appropriation made.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend, in the remark I made that the last Congress refused to make the appropriation for reasons that had been stated in the committee and in the public press, to cast any reflection upon the committee or to criticise the action of that Congress, because that is immaterial to the present question. It is not necessary in the construction of this bill to inquire what were the reasons that influenced the failure of Congress to make the appropriation. The fact alone remains that there was a failure, and that is enough for our present purposes.

Under the law as it existed before it was attempted to be changed by the Territorial Legislature this month would be the regular time for holding the session of that Legislature. Congress having failed to make an appropriation for the holding of that session last year, this would be the biennial session of the Legislature under the old law. But this curious question of law intervenes, namely, What effect did the law of 1882 of the Territory have upon the meeting, convening, calling together, or assembling of the Legislature without some affirmative action by Congress? It would be worse than useless for Congress to appropriate $25,000 to pay the members of the Territorial Legislature for this session if it should turn out by judicial decision that the Legislature was illegally convened. To save any question, therefore, and give them their regular biennial session, the Committee on Appropriations have reported to this House a proviso in effect setting aside the legislation of 1882 providing that the Legislature should meet in 1883 and biennially thereafter, and fixing the time of meeting on the third Monday in February of this year, and thenceforth biennially.

As to the wisdom of that action I have nothing to say. The fact, however, is that if this bill passes in its present shape it gives to the Legislature its biennial sessions in the even years, but provides that at the next session of that Legislature it shall fix the time for holding its session in 1886.

I may say here that if the Legislature that convenes under this act shall again fix the odd years for the meeting of the Territorial Legislature it will depend upon the next Congress to ratify that action by making the appropriation for their meeting. It is enough now to say that two years have elapsed since they had a legislature. The Territory is new. There is a great influx of immigration to the Territory. Needful laws are required and prompt action on the part of the Legislature to meet certain emergencies is necessary. And I think every gentleman will agree with me that in these Territories where immigration is flowing in, and which are being settled up rapidly, legislation once in two years is certainly required and necessary.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I may end what I have to say by remarking that Congress makes a provision in this bill saying that the members of the Legislature elected in 1882 shall be valid and legal members of the Legislature of New Mexico subject to all just and rightful contests. I think that would be so any way. But it was to save any question with reference to this Territorial law which was passed in 1882, ordering the sessions in 1883, 1885, 1887, and thereafter. That is the reason and the purpose of it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would suggest to the gentleman that he might also state that similar action has been taken in relation to other Territories.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, yes; this is not new at all. Though I have not had time to hunt up any of the precedents, still as a matter of history I know that generally Congress has taken this action or like action in regard to Territorial legislation heretofore.

I had designed to yield to the Delegate from New Mexico. But he informs me he will engage in the five-minute discussion, which will meet his views. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] five minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to one fact, and that is that while in the East they are manufacturing baskets and boots, we are trying to make commonwealths in the West. We are building up great States that will constitute an important portion of this Republic in a few years.

I understand from reliable and authoritative sources that there has been no meeting of the Legislature of New Mexico during the past three years for want of an appropriation made by this Government. I think that such a proceeding upon our part is absolutely shameful. I think we should recognize to the broadest extent and in the largest terms the people of the West; and we should enable them when they are incapable of enacting laws through Congress to enact their own laws, to secure the promotion of their own welfare, and to advance their own interests. I sincerely hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I now yield the floor. I presume the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], will probably desire to make some further explanation with reference to this rebate matter, which I have not gone into, and as to which I might simply say that the law passed by the last Congress provided for this rebate and did not make any appropriation to carry it out. I do not want to go into the discussion of that matter, but yield the floor for that purpose to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will explain as to that.

Mr. BURNES. I yield five minutes to the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. LUNA].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was informed by the gentleman from Indiana that the Delegate from New Mexico did not desire to speak now but proposed to speak under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BURNES. Then I yield to my friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY].

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will allow me to suggest to him that the true reason and probably the only reason why this rebate upon tobacco was not appropriated for in the last Congress was because the bill which provided for the rebate was only passed the 3d day of March; and the sundry civil bill had passed both Houses at that time and was in committee of conference, and there was no time to make the appropriate legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say that the law was passed during the past fiscal year, and that the indebtedness accrued during the past fiscal year. The claims had to be presented within sixty days following the 3d of March.

Mr. HISCOCK. The law which created this indebtedness was passed in the last Congress, beyond question.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is a matter of little moment how the bill was passed in its present shape. What we want is relief in this case; and it does not make any difference why there was not an appropriation made at that time in so far as the persons who wish this relief are concerned.

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, there was provision made for a reduction in the tax on tobacco, on cigars, on cigarettes, and cheroots. It is not necessary to state the precise amount of the reduction on those articles; but it was made, and then there was a provision made that a rebate or a drawback equal to the amount of the reduction should be allowed. It was clearly the intention that both the manufacturers and dealers of the country should get the benefit of that rebate on tobacco. But by some omission, brought about by what cause it does not now make any difference, while there was provision made to pay the manufacturers in stamps there was no provision made to pay the dealers, who could not get the stamps. The provision in the act was that the manufacturers should get the benefit of the rebate in stamps; but inasmuch as dealers do not get stamps and can not use stamps under the law, they were therefore bound to get the benefit of the act in money if they got it at all, and as there was no provision in the act to pay them money they failed to get the relief intended. That is the meaning of the provision. It simply makes an appropriation which should have been made by the last Congress.

Mr. BURNES. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. As my constituents are very largely interested in this bill, and as the bill reported back by the committee is in the main one which was introduced by myself in this Congress, I trust that I may be permitted to make one or two remarks.

And first, as to this bill, I would suggest to the gentleman having it in charge whether it would not be well to insert the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary." I do not know that that is needed, but my understanding from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is that there will not be needed the full amount here named of $3,750,000, but that that amount will cover all that will be needed. I suggest to the gentleman the propriety of inserting those words, which were in the original bill when introduced by myself.

Mr. BURNES. I have no objection to inserting those words.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, as to the question of the propriety or necessity of this appropriation I do not think there is any doubt. There is no question but that the law was intended to include and did include dealers in as well as manufacturers of tobacco. The reason why the appropriation was not made in the last Congress has not yet been given.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] undertakes upon that point, to which I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment, to explain the omission by reference to the fact that this bill was passed in the concluding days of the last session of Congress. It is true, as he states, that the law was passed in the hurry and confusion of the last few days of the last Congress.

But will the gentleman state whether there is any reason why provision could not have been made in the law for the dealers in tobacco as well as for the manufacturers of tobacco? Why could not the law have provided for the payment of the rebate to dealers as we are now called upon to provide?

What has been the result? In my own district and in many other districts throughout the country hundreds of poor men, dealers in unbroken packages, who come within the provisions of the law, not being familiar with the law, have been compelled to employ attorneys; and circulars were sent out from this city informing them that they must send their claims to attorneys here, and that from the amount of their just claims a deduction must be made. Even should this bill pass they will get their money with a loss in the aggregate of $40,000, $50,000, or perhaps $100,000, because of the failure of the last Congress to discharge its duty.

I call attention to this matter now as an injustice, one that we should avoid in the future, for these men have been compelled to wait this long time for their money, and many of them will get it only through the agency of paid attorneys.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. My friend was a member of the last Congress?

Mr. WILLIS. I was.

Mr. CANNON. Did my friend make any effort or motion to have such an appropriation made?

Mr. WILLIS. It was the misfortune of my friends and myself to be in the minority in the last Congress. And it was your fortune to bring in this bill as a conference report, affecting all these great interests, during the very last hours of the last Congress, which prevented amendment or debate; otherwise the bill never would have passed. That is my answer.

Mr. CANNON. My friend says he was in the minority; still, as I understand it, he was a member of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman say that I had any right to offer an amendment to the conference report?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me I will state what I intend. The gentleman was in the last Congress. I agree with him that this appropriation ought to have been then made. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], then the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has explained why it was not made.

The bill passed on the 3d day of March, after the sundry civil appropriation bill had been acted upon by both Houses. The Committee on Appropriations, therefore, had no authority under the rules of the House to make this appropriation. The Committee on Ways and Means reported this bill and submitted the conference report upon it. I will admit, if the gentleman chooses, that practically neither he nor I nor any other member of the House, owing to the lateness of the session at the time the bill was passed, had power to move this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has asked me a question and leaves me no time to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. The law provided for paying the rebate to manufacturers.

Mr. KELLEY. And would have included the dealers if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] had suggested it to the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, because it was intended to cover all.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman knows that we were put under the iron-clad rule of a conference report.

Mr. BURNES. I take great pleasure in yielding now to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], because I do not desire that in this debate anybody shall be censured or wronged. We all comprehend that there was no wrong intended and no wrong done. We simply state the fact that this Congress is providing for deficiencies created by the last; that is all.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will do so.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to say that while it is true that no suggestion of amendment could be made to the report of a committee of conference, that conference sat for two days, and its chairman and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] were not strangers to each other, and the kindest relations existed between them. If he had suggested an amendment it would unquestionably have been adopted, for it was the desire of the committee to make the rebate absolute and full.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman knows that neither I nor any other member of the House was aware what the report of the committee of conference would be until that committee entered this Hall.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to say that the omission to provide for the payment of this rebate was not the fault of the committee of conference. Does he undertake to say that the bill went from the House into the conference with that provision in it? The bill was considered here in the House; and no gentleman on the other side suggested that it should carry an appropriation to pay this rebate. No one noticed the omission. Am I not right in this? I ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the last House.

Mr. KELLEY. Entirely so.

Mr. HISCOCK. The provision never was considered in the House. If such a provision had gone upon the bill into the conference it would never have been struck out. The bill was also considered in the Senate; and it went from the Senate into the conference without any provision of the kind. The committee of conference had no jurisdiction over the subject whatever. There was no disagreement in the committee of conference upon this question. The distinguished gentleman who now presides over this House as its Speaker was at that time a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was then a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. There were also members on this floor taking great interest in this question. And yet it never occurred to any of them that there was an omission of this kind in the bill. It is one of those matters for which no one is to blame. So far as the Committee on Appropriations of the last House was concerned, I have explained that the committee did not consider it. The general appropriation bills were all in conference before this bill had passed; it was utterly impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to make any provision of this kind. But they did not think of it; no one thought of it.

Now, a single word in reference to the second provision of this bill.

As I understand, the last House adopted a provision for the payment of this sum of money for the legislative government of the Territory of New Mexico. The Legislature of that Territory had changed its time of meeting. A bill making provision to carry that change into effect went to the Senate of the United States. But that body did not indorse the change of the time of the meeting of that Territorial Legislature, and struck it out. In conference the provision went out of the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. That is correct. I had forgotten the fact.

Mr. HISCOCK. These are the facts with reference to that matter.

I have only desired, Mr. Chairman, to speak of this question because I have thought there was undue interest manifested on the other side of the House upon very small matters in reference to these deficiencies which have been presented here, and as to which there certainly was no intention on the part of the last Congress to omit full and ample provision.

Mr. BURNES resumed the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question, if he will yield.

Mr. BURNES. I have no objection to yielding for a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I presume it is a matter of regulation in the Department, but I want to ask the gentleman, for my own information and that of my constituents, as to the mode in which these claims will be paid after the appropriation shall be made. Will parties be paid by draft?

Mr. BURNES. The Secretary of the Treasury has made rules and regulations for the proving of these claims and the payment of the money. Various claims have been filed and approved or rejected. Where they have been approved, they will be paid to the party entitled by draft upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. When this appropriation shall have been made?

Mr. BURNES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MILLS. But we ought to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall mail the draft directly to the claimant.

Mr. BURNES. I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that we are all of one mind on this question; that there is no difference between us upon it. Whatever may have been the question in the Forty-seventh Congress, we find these obligations now due by the Government. The money is in the Treasury to pay them; the people to whom the money is due need it; and the people at large need to have the money in circulation rather than in the Treasury. This is an indebtedness which must be paid; and no doubt we are all in favor of paying it at once and being done with it. Under these circumstances and apprehending that the Committee of the Whole is now ready to rise, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that is done I wish to ask a question. In reference to claims reported by the Quartermaster's Department to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him submitted to the House, has it not been the custom to have a list of such claims printed and laid on our desks? I ask the gentleman whether any list of these rebate claims can be had by members?

Mr. BURNES. No such list by name has been furnished.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] ought to bear in mind that this is not technically paying a debt of the Government; it is virtually returning to these parties money which belongs to them; and there is no reason why they should be delayed until the Department can submit a list of the parties, with the amounts due them.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend from Kentucky, if he will reflect a moment, must see that to prepare and print a list of all these retail dealers who have small claims upon the Government would entail an expense which would not be compensated by the information afforded.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for one moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Indiana must see his argument is an appeal to me personally and not founded in reason. These war claims to which I allude, after twenty years' investigation by the War Department, must be reported to the Treasury and by the Treasury to us. They are printed and considered in the committee and by the House with just such a list of them before the members. Now, does the gentleman from Indiana mean to say a list of the men, an itemized list, who present these claims, will be such an enormous volume we can not have it laid on our desks?

Mr. CALKINS. I will say to my friend from Kentucky that there can be no difference between us at all in reference to this matter. Of course Congress has a right to the list if it so desires, but if the gentleman will look at the provision adopted at the last session of Congress he will see we gave to the Secretary of the Treasury certain directions in reference to paying these claims under rules and regulations to be established by himself. He did establish rules and regulations, but of course whatever his action may be is subject to review by this House at any time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to make a further statement to my friend from Indiana, if I have the permission of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNES. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no limit to my endurance, and I trust I may never find a limit to my courtesy and kindness. But I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that in reference to this plain matter of business I do not wish to see the House wander off to collateral and disconnected questions. I hope, therefore, he will waive the further consideration of the questions to which he alludes. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have furnished the Committee on Appropriations with a full and complete report of the number of these claims and the amount of all which have been approved and rejected. Every sort of information has been furnished to the committee which could be deemed of any sort of interest in this connection.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Allow me to say in regard to the ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue—— [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. BURNES. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to say that gentlemen should bear in mind the bill under which these rebate claims come in here was prepared under the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who has since resigned to become a claim agent, and that the fact he was to resign for that purpose was published all over the country before he sent in his resignation to the President and before the President fell upon his neck and wept, and that another Commissioner of Internal Revenue has since been appointed to do that which the ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommended should be done. These claims, therefore, come in here in a very suspicious manner, and I should like to see a printed list of them and their amounts laid upon the table. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. BURNES. It would afford me pleasure to hear the gentleman from Kentucky speak on the matter to which he has alluded, but it is not my duty at this time to go into that subject, and I trust the House therefore will pardon me if I refer it to other gentlemen and to a more appropriate occasion. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now before the Committee of the Whole House under general debate. If the gentleman desires to close general debate he can ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on the pending bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. BURNES. I move the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House to close general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURNES. I move that all general debate on the deficiency bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be closed in five minutes after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman to propose that general debate on the entire bill shall be limited to five minutes?

Mr. BURNES. I do.

Mr. SPRINGER. After that the debate will proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BURNES's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the deficiency bill, and, by order of the House, all general debate has been limited to five minutes.

Mr. BURNES. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to have read in this connection, from the regulations concerning the rebate on tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes under section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, a passage which I have marked and which I will send to the Clerk's desk. This paper was handed to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and as it is of interest to each of us on this floor as well as to our constituents, and as it verifies a statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], I ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the extract indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

On receipt of the claims by the Commissioner, they will be recorded and examined, and when found to be satisfactorily established will be forwarded directly to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, who will audit and send them to the First Comptroller. When an appropriation has been made by Congress for the payment of the claims, the Comptroller will, if they be found correct, certify them to the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of warrants for payment. The draft drawn upon such warrants will be sent by the Commissioner to the collectors, who will deliver them to the claimants in the usual manner of payment of refunding claims.

The rebate on tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes held by the manufacturer thereof may be paid in stamps, but on such goods held by a dealer the rebate will be paid in money whenever Congress shall make an appropriation therefor.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Is the bill now open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There remain four minutes of the time allowed for general debate. If any gentleman desires to be heard, the Chair will recognize him to occupy that time. If not, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the first clause of the bill for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter stated, namely:

For the purpose of paying the rebate claims as provided by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," $3,750,000.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I wish to offer the amendment to this section which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, at the end of the tenth line of the bill, the following words: "Which shall be paid to the various claimants whose claims are approved by Treasury warrant, sent directly to the claimant at his place of residence or business."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. My point of order is that it is new legislation and does not tend to retrench expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL. Reserve the point of order, so that the gentleman from Georgia may be heard.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, particularly to be heard upon the point of order. I feel sure, however, that the amendment I have suggested, if adopted, may tend to reduce expenditures on the part of the claimants to this fund. It is no part of the proposed amendment to increase expenditures. The purpose is simply to secure to these claimants, under the very regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prescribes, the amounts to which they are severally entitled under the operation of the law providing for this rebate; and instead of having the revenue office regulate the manner in which this money shall be distributed among the claimants, I propose to embody into the statute the very recommendation the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself proposes. At present we would be dependent entirely upon such regulations as that officer may prescribe. My amendment is intended to make it a part of the existing law.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, certainly the amendment which the gentleman from Georgia proposes is new legislation, and there is nothing in it which would necessarily decrease the amount covered by the bill. It is therefore, within the terms of the rule, subject to the point of order.

The Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress when this question of rebate was before them considered carefully the manner in which this money should be paid out, and I may be pardoned now for diverging from the point of order and addressing myself for a moment to the merits of the proposition the gentleman submits when I say that the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress considered the manner in which this rebate should be made, and considered it carefully, certainly, for the members of that committee whose constituents were specially interested in the measure, then in the minority, now in the majority, were prompt and careful men and looked thoroughly into the operations of the law then proposed to be enacted. I am opposed, therefore, to changing that regulation, since up to the present time we have acted under it; the claims have been filed and they have been already examined and allowed under its provisions.

I am not afraid to allow parties in this day and generation to make contracts with their agents or attorneys for the collection of their claims; and the circumstances surrounding the application for rebate in these cases is entirely different from those cases where an old claim is revived or dug up to be again presented. There is not a man in the United States interested in this matter, I presume, who does not know just what he wants to do in this connection; who knows what he is to expect from the operation of the law, and is fully aware of the circumstances surrounding the matter. Hasty legislation may embarrass them. These claims have already been audited, I understand, under the regulations of the Treasury Department itself, and the money is ready to be paid out. No doubt in many cases powers of attorney have been given for its collection.

I say this much as to the merits of the amendment; but I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from New York what would be the manner of payment of these claims under existing law?

Mr. HISCOCK. Under the existing law, under the revenue bill which passed last year, provision was made as to the manner in which this rebate should be refunded to the parties under certain rules and regulations to be made by the Treasury Department. Now, here by an affirmative provision we are providing something new, and adding a new regulation, which is an addition to the law of last Congress.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], as I understand, insists this is already provided for. Then if it be already provided for, how is it new legislation to put it again in this bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. I said the manner in which the money is to be paid out is provided for. The regulations of the Treasury Department have already been made and promulgated to the country and these claims have been acted upon under those regulations up to the present time. What effect it might have on these regulations I do not know. It might be to make a halt in the payment and defeat the very object the gentleman from Georgia has in view; that is, prompt payment.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the adjustments are going on smoothly, and there will be no delay I think in the immediate payment. I think it will be perhaps better to leave the matter to the regulations rather than to attempt a change of law which may be subject to the point of order. I have myself no objection to the amendment, but the committee have not, of course, authorized the acceptance of any such amendment. I do not think the object the gentleman from Georgia has in view will at all suffer if the amendment is not adopted.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I yield with great deference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of course; but I would like to ask him if his attention has been called to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that the matter of my amendment is already provided for by existing law?

Mr. RANDALL. I would not say that. I would say on the point of order that this changes existing law, because it makes new law.

Mr. HISCOCK. It has been frequently held by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, and by all the authorities which I have been compelled to recognize as a member of this House, that the making of new law, affirmative legislation, is a change of law.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not said anything to the contrary of that. That is, in effect, what I did say.

Mr. WILLIS. Here is the law, if the Chair will allow me to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir; on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. This is the law:

It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

That is section 4, which has reference to these rebate claims.

Mr. CALKINS. So that any rules and regulations made under that law have the effect of positive law.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. As I understand the statute just read by my friend from Kentucky certain regulations which have been read by my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] are all part of the existing system and the existing law. And I make the point that my amendment simply carries into this appropriation bill that portion of the existing law which I desire to be put there, and, so there may be no mistake about it, takes away from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the power to alter these regulations which have been read in the hearing of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment would change the law as it now stands with regard to the payment of amounts appropriated by Congress to individuals, and in so far as it changes the existing law in that respect is new legislation which does not retrench expenses. Therefore the Chair holds the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, strike out the words "three millions;" so that it will read:
For the purpose of paying the rebate claims as provided for by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," $750,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress a bill was passed to take certain taxes off banks and off tobacco dealers, match manufacturers, and manufacturers of proprietary medicines, perfumery, &c. I called attention at that time to the fact that that would not give relief to the growers of tobacco; that at that time we had over one hundred millions of dollars in the Treasury; that the tax on tobacco, which was a part of a war necessity, was bringing in more money than there was present necessity for; that it could all be taken off, and that any effort to resist the removal of all tax on tobacco was an effort that was being made by certain manufacturers in certain cities and their agents here in Washington.

I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that this bill is a verification of the words I uttered on that occasion, and of what was stated not only by myself, but by other gentlemen on both sides of the House. Here we have a proposition to appropriate $3,750,000—for what? To give relief to the farmer? No, sir; but to aid the monopolists and manufacturers, who still control the tobacco markets and the price of tobacco raised on the farm. The reduced tax on leaf-tobacco has not helped the farmer much. This is a proposition to put money into the hands of the clients of the late Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on whose recommendation a Republican House passed the bill that produced the enormity presented to us to-day.

I suppose I need not appeal to this House to wait until we get a report of the items which make up this $3,750,000. There is a disposition to rush things so, and the larger the appropriation the more speedily it is rushed.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to direct his attention to the fact that while this is in the nature of a rebate, yet it grows out of reduction of tax on tobacco of every description?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Exactly; it is a reduction of tax to the amount of one-half.

Mr. RANDALL. If you will introduce a bill for taking off the other half I will go for it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But Congress did not do it last session when I urged total abolition of the tobacco tax, and it will not do it this session.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me. What I am now trying to say is that the reduction of one-half of the tax on tobacco, which we made at the last session of Congress, was not for the benefit of the people who most deserve it, of the farmers and the growers of tobacco, but it was for the benefit of the manufacturers who held these unbroken packages, and who come here to-day for the payment of this rebate. The farmer will receive not one farthing benefit from that rebate legislation. The same influence that reduced the tax on tobacco to 8 cents a pound can reduce it again to 4 cents a pound, and it may be again reduced to 2 cents a pound. But the farmer will not be benefited until the entire tobacco tax is wiped out.

What relief has the abolition of the tax on patent medicines given to any one who buys patent medicines? Has it cheapened the article at all? Not one cent. What relief has the reduction of the tax on banks given to the men who borrow money? None at all.

This is a practical question, in which are interested the people who live in the mountains of Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Kentucky, people in remote localities who can do nothing but submit to the dictation of these large manufacturers.

The law of the last session was passed to please the manufacturers. It was recommended by the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who afterward resigned his place to take the position of lobbyist, of log-roller, of claim agent for the very men who are interested in this bill. Now, I want to see their names on paper; I want to see the amount of each claim put down opposite each name. I want to know in what city or what town each claimant lives.

The poor man who in the last war lost a pair of bed blankets or a horse, or whose cattle or corn was taken for the use of the Federal Army, must prove up his claim and must prove his loyalty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] agreed to give me a part of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair allowed for the interruption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I thank the Chair for doing so.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to say that there are a large number of tobacco manufacturers in my district, and I am daily receiving letters urging the speedy passage of this bill. The most of these men are poor men; and they have felt very severely the want of this money. They are very impatient and are importuning me constantly to do something to aid the passage of this bill. They feel that they have been wronged.

It seems to me that it is trifling with this class of people to delay any longer the passage of this bill. I hope, therefore, that it will be passed in its present shape, and passed promptly. I see no need whatever of any delay.

I am unable to comprehend the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE]. They seem to me to be wholly inapplicable to this bill. The law was passed last year, and in it there was an omission by mistake. This bill proposes to rectify that mistake, and to make up to these people the money to which they were then entitled. I hope there will be no further delay.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say that this appropriation bill is compulsory by reason of existing law. I am sorry that the law did not go further. But I do not agree with the logic of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] that objects to taking off one-half of the tax, because all that he wants taken off has not been repealed. I am willing that one-half shall be taken off, so that I may more easily and speedily secure the abolition of the other half.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to say simply that the system of espionage that is now enforced is fostered and maintained and will continue until the tobacco tax is entirely wiped out. To leave the tax at 8 cents a pound is no relief to the farmer, and is as great a protection to the manufacturer as a tax of 16 or 24 cents a pound.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to move an amendment, to come in after the word "dollars," in line 10; to insert what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all proper claims for rebate under said act which were deposited in the mail within sixty days following the date of the reduction, addressed to the proper officer, shall be allowed and paid as if presented within the time allowed by law.

Mr. BURNES. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. It comes under the decision made by the Chair a moment ago.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] withhold that point of order so that I may make a very brief statement?

Mr. BURNES. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Of course reserving the right to make the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I will do so.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The law as passed last Congress reducing internal taxes and giving this rebate required that claims for the rebate should be presented within sixty days from the passage of the act.

Now, in portions of Alabama and elsewhere in the United States the mails were very irregular, particularly the country mails. In many cases merchants made out their claims and put them in the mail in time to have reached the proper officers within the sixty days; but through the fault of the Government, or the agents of the Government engaged in carrying the mails, these claims did not reach the proper officer within the sixty days, so that without any fault on their part these parties are deprived of the benefits of this rebate.

Now, it seems to me that the claims of these men are just as meritorious as any others. All that my amendment provides is that if persons having proper claims for rebate deposited those claims in the mails, addressed to the proper officer, within the sixty days, such parties shall be permitted to enjoy the benefit of this rebate. It seems to me the gentleman from Missouri ought to admit the amendment.

Mr. BURNES. It would afford me great pleasure, indeed, to accommodate the gentleman from Alabama; and he will allow me to say that the legislation proposed is not by any means such as I should feel inclined to oppose if it should come to this House from the Committee on Ways and Means. I trust he will present the cases of grievance of this sort to the House in another form. I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The Clerk read the remainder of the bill, as follows:

For the legislative expenses of the Territory of New Mexico, namely:

For per diem of members and officers of the Legislative Assembly, mileage of members, printing, incidental expenses, including secretary's office, and $800 for translating bills, laws, and journals of the Legislative Assembly, $21,965.

That the members elected to the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico in November, A. D. 1882, and all vacancies legally filled since that time, if any, are hereby declared to be the legal members of the Legislature hereby authorized, subject to all valid contests. The said Territorial Legislature shall convene on the third Monday in February, 1884, and shall not continue in session exceeding forty legislative days. The next Territorial Legislature of New Mexico shall convene in the year 1886, at such time as may be fixed by the Legislature at the session hereby authorized.

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend by adding to the bill the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transportation of silver coin, as required by law, $5,000.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill——

Mr. BLAND. This is a deficiency bill.

Mr. CALKINS. And that it is new legislation.

Mr. BLAND. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, at the last session of Congress we appropriated, for the purpose of transporting minor coins, the sum of $10,000. This amendment is simply for the purpose of carrying out that existing law. The amendment proposes to provide for a deficiency; and this is a deficiency bill. As will be remembered, a law was enacted in the Forty-fifth Congress by which provision was made for the redemption of the subsidiary coinage. Under that law railroad companies and others receiving large amounts of these coins have the privilege of presenting them in amounts of $100 at any Government depository and obtaining for them legal-tender money. Deposits of these minor coins have been made under that law; and the effect has been to accumulate in the various subtreasuries and in the Government vaults here in Washington various sums, reaching now $27,000,000. In order to distribute the accumulations of fractional coins in the various subtreasuries, appropriations have been made from time to time by Congress. The amendment I now submit is for a deficiency occurring under the law passed at the last session.

When I first came to Washington this winter I met Mr. Wyman, the Treasurer of the United States, and I spoke of the great difficulty experienced in my section in obtaining for purposes of business these smaller coins; and he remarked that the difficulty arose from the fact that last October the appropriation for distributing these coins throughout the country had become exhausted. I have here a telegram from Mr. Wyman to the effect that $5,000 is the amount estimated as necessary to distribute these coins until the beginning of the next fiscal year.

It seems to me there can be no objection to this proposition. Twenty-seven million dollars of these coins are now locked up here in the Treasury. The people want them, the law requires that they shall be sent out. My amendment merely provides the necessary appropriation for this purpose. This being a small matter, and the Committee on Appropriations having other measures under consideration, I suppose they have not taken up this subject; but certainly no gentleman on this floor can object to this small appropriation of $5,000 which is asked for to meet the necessity of sending out these subsidiary coins, in accordance with the demand of the business interests everywhere throughout the land.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations have not forgotten this matter. They have had it under consideration. They have received a communication in relation to it from a subordinate officer of the Treasury Department, but have had no communication in reference to it from the Secretary of the Treasury. In the absence of any estimate for this object we have desired to know what is his judgment. The committee will give the matter due consideration, and an appropriation of this kind will probably be inserted in the smaller deficiency bill.

Mr. BLAND. The general deficiency bill does not take effect until July next.

Mr. RANDALL. Appropriations for deficiencies take effect immediately.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will allow me, I will have a telegram from the Treasurer read.

Mr. RANDALL. We have a letter from him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds gentlemen that discussion is not in order except upon the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the point of order was waived, so as to allow the merits of the proposition to be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order is insisted upon.

Mr. CALKINS. It is.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can assure us that an appropriation of this kind will be reported by the Committee——

Mr. RANDALL. We have taken the matter into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BLAND. If it be in order I should like to have a vote on my amendment. It is a matter of public interest, and it has been delayed too long already.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it does not change existing law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I appeal to the gentleman from Missouri to let it come in regular order on the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Do not let us embarrass this bill with anything not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion the amendment is in order. It is as much in order as the other parts of the bill. It provides for supplying a deficiency in an appropriation made at the last session which was inadequate in amount.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the necessity for deferring it.

Mr. RANDALL. We wish to consider it at the proper time with similar matters. We have not yet heard from the Secretary of the Treasury and whether he approves of it or not.

Mr. BLAND. Let it go, then, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. An additional reason is we do not wish to see this bill embarrassed in that way.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BURNES. I move the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL. In accordance with the suggestion made in the committee, I move to insert the words, in line 10, "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so it will read:

For the purpose of paying the rebate claims as provided by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," $3,750,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. On the passage of the bill, in accordance with the practice, the Chair will direct the yeas and nays to be taken.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 271, nays 1, not voting 48; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, with Mr. MAYO.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. MOREY.

Mr. JORDAN with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. JAMES.

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am announced as being paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. KETCHAM]; but as I assume that my vote on this question is not in violation of that pair, I shall let it stand.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON]; but believing that he would vote "ay" on this question, I have also voted.

Mr. MOREY. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] on all political questions; but not considering this a question of that character, I have voted.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to have my name recorded as voting on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman answer when his name was called?

Mr. MORGAN. I was in my seat, but did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House no member is permitted to vote after the second call of the roll unless his name was omitted from the call by accident.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will ask unanimous consent to record my name.

The SPEAKER. That has been sometimes allowed where the Chair understands the gentleman to say that he was in his seat giving attention. The Chair will therefore ask unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman's name be recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the rule on the subject?

The SPEAKER. The rule is very clear that after the completion of the second roll-call no member's vote can be recorded.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table with a view of referring the bills there to appropriate committees.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL H. LOCKETT.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama; which was read by its title a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no objection we might as well dispose of that bill at once by putting it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed from Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

IRON MOUNTAIN RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 353) to repeal section 1 of the act entitled "An act making a grant of land in alternate sections to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to Helena, Ark.," approved July 4, 1866, and for other purposes; which was read by its title a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SPANISH FERRY-BOAT NUESTRA SEÑORA DE REGLA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla; which was read by its title a first and second time.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that a bill of a similar character has been before the Committee on the Judiciary and was reported to the House unanimously by the committee, and therefore I move that this bill be put upon its passage. The bill to which I refer was reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], but he is not present, and I therefore move that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. The report accompanying the bill had better be read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the bill and report both read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is no report accompanying the Senate bill. Does the gentleman desire to have the report upon the House bill read?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let that be read.

Mr. POLAND. I will state that the substance of the bill is to carry into effect a judgment of the United States court.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first ascertain whether the report accompanying the House bill is here or at the Printing Office.

Mr. RANDALL. The report ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the report has not yet been returned from the Printing Office.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont, then, to let the bill remain in its present condition until the report has been printed.

Mr. POLAND. Then I move that it be laid aside informally.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objections, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

THOMAS B. SHANNON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 332) for the relief of Thomas B. Shannon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 346) to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes so as not to exclude retired Army officers from holding civil offices in the Territories; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. REED. I would inquire if there has not been some such bill as that reported here in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. McMILLIN. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. REED. Has not some such bill been reported by a committee of the House?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that we had that question up during the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed there is such a bill now pending in committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. 26) granting permission to Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph from the Government of Austria; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MARGARET CASSIDY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 298) for the relief of Margaret Cassidy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

MRS. S. A. WRIGHT AND MRS. C. FAHNESTOCK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 297) for the relief of Mrs. S. A. Wright and Mrs. C. Fahnestock; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. VANCE. Let that bill also go to the Committee on Patents.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Patents.

FRANCES E. STEWART.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 47) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JOINT RULES.

The SPEAKER. There are also on the Speaker's table joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives adopted by the Senate and communicated to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. If no one objects, I would like now to move that the House adjourn.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman to withhold the motion to adjourn for one moment. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask that that committee have the permission of the House to sit to-morrow and next day during the sittings of the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimons consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the first paragraph of clause 7 of Rule XXIII be amended so as to read as follows:

"A motion in a Committee of the Whole House to strike out the enacting clause of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend, and shall not be debatable, and if carried shall be considered equivalent to its rejection."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I ask unanimous consent to present the resolutions and petition which I send to the desk. And I wish to say that I have fully apprised the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] of the nature and contents of these resolutions and the desire of the parties represented by them, and that gentleman has signified his assent.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman send up these papers?

Mr. WELLER. For the purpose of having them read at the desk, printed, and referred to the appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] asks unanimous consent to present certain resolutions; and also asks that they be printed in the RECORD and referred.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to know what they are?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

Mr. STEELE. I object. Those petitions can reach the committees in the regular way through the petition-box.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senase had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act "making appropriations for supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years," approved March 3, 1883.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution of the House making an appropriation for the Greely relief expedition, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

There was no objection; and accordingly the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 2, after the word "expedition," insert the words "to be composed of volunteers for the service;" so that it will read:

"That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to prepare and dispatch an expedition, to be composed of volunteers for the service, to the coast of Greenland, Smith's Sound, or Lady Franklin Bay, for the purpose of relieving and bringing home Lieut. A. W. Greely and party," &c.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, having been requested so to do by such members of the Committee on Appropriations as I have been able to confer with. It is not clear to my mind what the effect of that amendment will be. I am advised that it may embarrass the officials of the Government in the management of the expedition, and I have been asked that the House be allowed opportunity to understand the subject fully before it acts upon this amendment. I therefore move to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to state now, what I have stated many times already, that we who sit out here in the rear can not hear what is going on in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. If the remark of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is in relation to this joint resolution, I can only say that I was unable to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the difficulty under which the gentleman labors is occasioned in a great part by conversation immediately in rear of the outer seats of the Hall. The Chair appeals to gentlemen on both sides of the House, and especially in the rear of the seats, to stop conversation, as it interferes with members, especially those who are unfortunately located far from the Clerk's desk.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL to non-concur in the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. THOMPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 126) fixing the date on which the payment of the thirty-two clerks of committees of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, by unanimous consent, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 27) to amend an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRAUDULENT CLAIMANTS OF PATENTS, ETC.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3964) to make fraudulent claimants of patents and fraudulent vendors of patented articles guilty of a misdemeanor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

ALONZO GESNER.

Mr. LEWIS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-SERVICE COMMISSIONERS ON THE FLOOR.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Civil Service be admitted to the privileges of the floor of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. If that resolution is for reference, I will not object to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. If there is objection to its immediate consideration, I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Rules.

STANDARD TIME FOR SEAPORT TOWNS, ETC.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3965) to provide for transmitting standard time from the Naval Observatory at Washington to ports of entry and other cities, and for placing time-balls on custom-houses for the protection of commerce, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REV. ANDREW W. GREY.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3966) for the relief of Rev. Andrew W. Grey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DETAIL OF PENSION CLERKS FOR HOUSE COMMITTEES.

Mr. MATSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the reference of the joint resolution.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, if in his opinion the public interest will not suffer thereby, upon request of either of the Committees hereinafter named, to detail from that Department one clerk to act as assistant clerk to the House Committee on Pensions, and one clerk to act as assistant clerk to the House Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution just read, but I would like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. MATSON. I will explain it in a moment. The object and purpose of the joint resolution is to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to detail from his office one person to act as assistant clerk to the Committee on Pensions of this House and one person to act as assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who are to take charge of the important papers brought from the Pension Office for the consideration of those two committees.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is the proposition to employ additional clerks or to detail clerks from the Pension Office?

Mr. MATSON. To detail them from the Pension Office, if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior it can be done without injury to the service. The whole matter is left to his discretion, and the detail is not to be made except on the request of the committee. There certainly can be no objection to it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not the fact that during the last Congress, without a resolution of this kind, there was a man detailed for this purpose?

Mr. MATSON. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I know that during the last Congress Mr. Vangruder was detailed and served.

Mr. MATSON. He served as a regularly employed clerk of the committee, being furloughed from the Pension Office.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Furloughed without pay?

Mr. MATSON. Furloughed without pay.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Why can not that be done now? The manner in which he discharged the duty there was very satisfactory.

Mr. MATSON. That might be done now, but the better way is to authorize the detail of a clerk from the bureau. The pay of a man as clerk of the committee is greater than the pay of one as clerk in the Pension Office. The joint resolution is preferable on account of economy.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this resolution; but I take this occasion to call attention to the peanut manner of conducting the public business of this nation. I think that every member of this House ought to be provided with a clerk.

A MEMBER. At the public expense?

Mr. BELFORD. At the public expense, because each member is here charged with the transaction of public business. Every day of my life I receive a hundred letters from my constituents, which I am compelled to answer; and it takes my entire salary to pay my clerk-hire. If I had not an independent income, I should be a pauper or out of this House. [Laughter.] You have had the heroic courage to take away from us the franking privilege; yet it costs me a dollar a day, or more, to pay my postage. Why do you not have the courage to act as the representatives of a heroic, a magnificent, and a generous nation?

Now, Mr. Speaker, instead of detailing two clerks from the Pension Office, why does not this House appoint these two clerks and pay their salaries out of the contingent fund provided by law? Why go to the Secretary of the Interior and ask him to diminish the clerical force of his Department in order that he may send clerks to this House? Are you going to pose as economists? Are you going to play the rôle of parsimonists? Or are you going to be generous in the use of the money that is in the Treasury of this nation? [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question was decided in the affirmative; there being—ayes 146, noes 3.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEECE. I move that the House adjourn.

Pending the motion the following business was transacted by unanimous consent.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DORSHEIMER, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the documents relating to the bill (H. R. 5839) of the last Congress to refund excessive duties caused by overvaluation of the Austrian paper florin be withdrawn from the files of the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, there having been no adverse report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FINDLAY, for to-morrow, on account of important business;

To Mr. DARGAN, for one week, on account of important business; and

To Mr. DORSHEIMER, until next Monday, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. NEECE that the House adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 25, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. ELIAS DE WITT HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing, in compliance with the requirements of a resolution of the 14th instant, the amounts of gold coin and bullion and silver dollars deposited in the Treasury, subtreasuries, and designated depositories of the United States in exchange for silver certificates during the years 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, and the portions of said period such exchanges were refused, with reasons therefor; which, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 120) giving the thanks of Congress to the men who rescued the survivors of the wreck of the steamer City of Columbus was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COKE. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Texas, now in session, requesting the Senators and Representatives from Texas to urge the passage of a bill now pending before Congress that has for its object the granting of the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Railroads, that committee having charge of the right-of-way bill to which it refers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of Milwaukee, Wis., in which they resolve—

That it is the immediate duty of the American Government to retaliate against the French, German, and other nations that refuse to receive sound and wholesome American meats, especially to prohibit the importation of their wines and liquors, that are known and acknowledged to be so extensively adulterated, &c.

I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a memorial to Congress adopted by the board of supervisors of Saint Croix County, Wisconsin, in which that body respectfully request that Congress will enact a law providing that railroads engaged in carrying commodities from one State to another shall not charge more by the car-load for a shorter distance than the same company charges for a longer distance. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of the State of Kansas, praying that that portion of the Indian Territory known as Oklahoma may be opened to settlement.

I have observed that the Committee on Indian Affairs have reported back similar petitions heretofore referred to them with a recommendation that the prayer of the petitioners be not granted; but I will venture to ask that this petition be referred to the same committee, and to say that if that committee will give to this subject in all the aspects of it which are suggested by this petition that attention which I think it is entitled to, they will find that, whether the prayer of the petition should be granted or not, something at least should be done to limit the Indian holdings in the Indian Territory and prepare for the inevitable extension of white settlement into that Territory, and which if it do not come under the authority of law within a reasonable period of time will undoubtedly come, as it has heretofore on Indian reservations, by the irruption of men who, hungering for homes, will not longer be denied.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Electa W. Jacobs, of Mount Airy, Ohio, praying to be granted a pension on account of her son Nathan Jacobs, late first lieutenant Twelfth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of Moses Smith, of Henderson County, Tennessee, the petition of John A. Greer, administrator of William Daniell, deceased, of Madison County, Tennessee, and the petition of Galen G. Green, attorney for the legal representatives of John W. Robinson, deceased, of Madison County, Tennessee, asking compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late rebellion; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Robert I. Chester, of Tiptonville, Tenn., praying that a portion of the fund appropriated for improving the Mississippi River be set apart for the construction of a levee from Hickman, Ky., to Island No. 10, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and Tributaries.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., relating to an increase of the naval force of the United States. It is a matter of importance, and the case is stated here in very vigorous language. I have been requested to ask that this memorial be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears no objection, and the memorial will be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, desire respectfully but urgently to call your attention to the absolute necessity for a prompt and large increase in the naval forces of the United States by the addition thereto of heavy and full-powered armored vessels, as well as iron cruisers developing the highest speed; both classes to be armed with the heavy rifled ordnance, now accepted among maritime powers as a necessity for effective service.

With a coast line of thousands of miles on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans everywhere exposed to the attack of a naval force, with fortifications armed with useless smooth-bore guns, with rich and prosperous cities defenseless against any power possessed of a few first-class modern war vessels, our country has for years done comparatively nothing for the national defense afloat, and at the initiation of a maritime war would be at the mercy of the enemy.

We respectfully submit that such a condition of affairs is disgraceful to our country, wanting in patriotism, and devoid of the prudence which should characterize nations as well as individuals.

With an overflowing Treasury and a patriotic people, our Government has depended upon the good-will of foreign nations, without a respectable naval force either to protect its citizens abroad or to enforce a national policy in case of necessity.

We respectfully urge upon our fellow-citizens in Congress that an adherence to such a policy is a crime against our country. This Chamber of Commerce, representing a community on the western extreme of the Republic, defenseless and inviting attack, respectfully enters its solemn protest against a policy dangerous to our safety and mortifying to our patriotism. We respectfully represent that the American people will not fail to approve of an honest expenditure of millions for defense against aggression. Permit us, then, to entreat you to inaugurate a policy of preparation for maritime war, remembering always that therein rests the greatest security for peace.

Earnestly requesting your attention to the considerations herein set forth, we subscribe ourselves, with great respect,

Your fellow-citizens,

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO.
HIRAM JERVIS, President.
D. J. STAPLES, First Vice-President.
ANDREW WELCH, Second Vice-President.

Adopted January 15, 1884.

Mr. HARRIS. I present severally the petitions of W. E. Matthews, executor of the estate of William Clements, deceased, of Gibson County, Tennessee; of George T. Taylor, of Tipton County, Tennessee; of Altha Thomas, administrator of John B. Thomas, deceased, of Madison County, Tennessee; and of Wiard W. Wilkinson, of Haywood, Tenn., all praying compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to

Mr. CALL presented an affidavit of Caroline Clarke in support of the application of Jane Latham Donelly, only surviving child of Amos Latham, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, for a bounty land-warrant, claimed to be due said Latham; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to accompany Senate bill No. 965.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 352) for the relief of Thomas H. Reeves, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back favorably the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations; and as it is a short bill and relates to a matter of interest and importance before the country, I ask that it be read and placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks that the bill be read at length. If there be no objection, it will be read.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That upon a deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. And that all laws and parts of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 638) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1272) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Canfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 1273) for the relief of the State University of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1274) for the relief of Reuben B. Clark and Sayles J. Bowen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1275) to provide for the free circulation of newspapers and other periodical publications within the State where the same are published; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VEST (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1276) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the Chain of Rocks, in the northern part of the city of Saint Louis, State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1277) granting a pension to Harriet P. Dame; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1278) to facilitate the reform of the civil service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. RANSOM introduced a bill (S. 1279) to provide for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1280) to extend the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1855, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1281) for continuing work on improvement of the harbor of Tampa, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1282) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ANTONIO BARRIOS AND JOSÉ VICTOR ZAVALA.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave at this time to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Antonio Barrios, of Guatemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua. It will take but a moment. I think there will be no objection to it. I had a request from the Secretary of State yesterday in reference to it, it being a matter in relation to citizens of a foreign government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want that to stand in the way of the resolution which is to come up this morning.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. If it creates debate I will let it go over. There is nothing in it to cause debate.

The joint resolution was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendment to the said joint resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. MILLER of California, and Mr. SAULSBURY the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. BECK and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I rose a little while ago, but gave way to other matters, intending to call up a bill which I had laid on the table for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Finance after saying a few words in regard to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business for the present. I have no doubt that I shall be able to give way after a little while. I call for the regular order of business now reached under the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not delay the Senator long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate under the head of "concurrent and other resolutions" the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on the 23d instant, relating to alleged election outrages in the States of Virginia and Mississippi; which was laid over for consideration under the rules.

Mr. LAMAR. I would respectfully inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he desires to press the consideration of that resolution this morning. If not, there are Senators around me who would prefer to have it postponed until Monday by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all to postponing it until Monday if that is the desire of the Senate or the general desire of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, because when it is called up I propose to have a vote upon it. In order that every one may have an opportunity to consider it, I am perfectly willing that by unanimous consent the resolution shall be postponed until Monday, provided it does not leave its present position in the order of business.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if it would not be quite as well, in view of the fact that there is already a special order for Monday, that at some later day in next week the resolution be by unanimous consent, or by any other method, taken up?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not hear the Senator quite.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply inquired if it would not be better to fix some later day in the week than Monday, as there is already a special order for that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask what that special order is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 19, reported by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to ascertain and settle certain private land claims, was made the special order for Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a resolution directing a committee of this body to proceed with a certain investigation, and I think it would be better to let it come up in the morning hour on Monday and to proceed with it. I hope we can get a vote on it in a short time. I do not desire to debate it myself, and I hope that we shall be able to dispose of it without interfering with other business.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope that no action will be taken by the Senate tending to displace the consideration specially ordered by the Senate at 2 o'clock on Monday for the general bill relating to the settlement of private land claims. It is a bill of public importance, and I trust that whatever may be the action of the Senate now in respect to the present resolution it will not be allowed to disturb in the least the disposition already made by the Senate in assigning as the special order Senate bill No. 19 for Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am disposed to accede to the request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to postpone this resolution until Monday, without a displacement of its present position, to be taken up then in its order when resolutions are reached; and I hope the Senate will then adhere to it and consider it until it is disposed of, although, as a matter of course, it is at any time within the power of the Senate by a majority vote to take up the special order; or perhaps it would come up at 2 o'clock, and the Senate could then choose as to whether it would proceed to dispose of the resolution or not. With that understanding I will agree to have the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Chair be kind enough to state it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is that the resolution lie over in its present order on the Calendar, to be laid before the Senate on Monday morning at the beginning of the call for resolutions, which is its present position.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator by that mean to displace the special order made for Monday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not have that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not have that effect. The special order comes up at 2 o'clock on Monday, but I give the Senate notice that unless the resolution is disposed of at 2 o'clock I shall seek to have it continued under consideration till a vote is reached. But the bill which the Senator from Delaware has in charge is the special order and will come up on Monday.

Mr. BAYARD. I trust sincerely that whatever notice may be given the Senate will not revoke its action upon a bill of so important a character as the one which has already been assigned as the special order for Monday. I will further ask the Chair for information: Does the present suggested arrangement bring the resolution under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BAYARD. I made the inquiry because as none but unobjected cases can be considered under that rule it would be scarcely worth while to place the resolution in that category.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will follow the ordinary course of such resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the resolution lie over until Monday in its present position on the table of the President, to be laid before the Senate with the same rights it has to-day? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAYARD. With the distinct understanding that it in no way affects the action of the Senate in regard to the bill which has been intrusted to me by the Committee on Private Land Claims, I make no objection; otherwise, I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PURCHASE OF UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. BECK. I desire to call up the bill (S. 1070) to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from purchasing the bonds of the United States above their par value, and for other purposes, which is now on the table, in order to have it referred to the Committee on Finance, desiring, however, to say a few words about it, not occupying over five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be now taken up for reference, with some remarks to be submitted by the Senator now. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The bill is before the Senate, and will be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1881, which provides "that the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled," shall not be so construed as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at a premium any of the outstanding bonds of the United States in advance of the time when they become redeemable at the option of the United States under existing law.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the object I have in calling the attention of the Senate to this bill now is, first, because the Committee on Finance this morning has reported a bill which will pass, in some form or other, I presume, for the purpose of settling what the rights of national banks shall be in the future as to their bonds and circulation. Supplementing that, and I think as a necessary part of it, the Senate ought to determine what is the true construction of the act of March 3, 1881, relative to the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds not payable at the option of the Government at any premium he sees fit to pay beyond such bonds as are required for the wants of the sinking fund, if that thing is to be perpetuated. If our rate of taxation is to be kept up to $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 in excess of our needs, and purchases of bonds are to be made by the Secretary in his discretion at any premium he pleases, there will be quite as much instability in the bonds of the United States and the circulation of banks based upon these bonds as exists now. Indeed, all our efforts to secure a stable basis for bank circulation is destroyed by the construction now given to the act of March 3, 1881.

My bill assumes that the purpose of Congress in passing the act of March 3, 1881, was simply to provide for a then existing exigency and not to give to the Secretary authority to go into the market for all time and buy bonds of the United States not due nor payable at our option at 20, 22, 24, or any other per cent. premium that the holders of them might ask, when we are seeking to secure stability and certainty in those outstanding obligations and asking banking corporations to buy them because most of them are permanent until the year 1907.

I hold in my hand the RECORD containing what occurred in relation to the passage of that bill. It was an amendment or section added to the sundry civil bill of that year, which I had in charge, and I consented to that section being added to the bill because of the then pressing exigency for that particular action. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], who was then chairman of the Finance Committee, presented it. I, as a member of the Finance Committee, had agreed to it and thought it was right upon a very urgent letter sent us by the then Secretary of the Treasury, now the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. The RECORD shows this:

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer the following as an additional section to the bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky consent to the amendment being acted on now?

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment has been submitted to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. BECK. This may as well be acted on now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

"SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled."

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator if that applies to all the different character of bonds, the fours, four-and-a-halfs, fives, and sixes?

Mr. BAYARD. It will apply to any bonds which it is optional with the Government to pay.

These were the only bonds that the mover of the amendment thought it would apply to or ought to apply to. Some other remarks were made, and Mr. McDonald, then a Senator from Indiana, asked:

Ought it not be limited to the purchasing of those bonds?

After having been assured by the Senator in charge of the amendment that that was what he intended and what I, who was in charge of the sundry civil bill, believed, no objection was made and it became a law. The then Secretary of the Treasury had written to the Committee on Finance this letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 2, 1881.

SIR: If there is any possibility of the defeat of the refunding act it is of vital importance that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized by law at the present session to apply the surplus revenue to the purchase or payment of bonds. Inclosed I send you a statement of the sinking-fund account for the year ending June 30, 1881, from which it appears that the deficiency in that fund will probably be made good by the 1st of July next.

There are grave doubts whether the Secretary of the Treasury will be authorized to apply the surplus revenue in excess of the sinking fund to the payment of either the fives or sixes of 1881, because they are not due in the legal sense of that word, but are only payable "at the pleasure of the United States," a discretion which the Secretary could not exercise except by express authority of law.

I have the honor to request, therefore, that, if consistent with the rules of the Senate, an amendment be made to an appropriation bill authorizing the application of all surplus revenue to the purchase of bonds. The inclosed provision copied from the pending refunding bill will answer the purpose. In the absence of such provision a dangerous and unnecessary accumulation of money in the Treasury may occur during the next fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

While the language is broad enough to entitle that section to the construction which is now given to it of conferring absolute power and authority on the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase any bonds anywhere, the words of the then Secretary of the Treasury that "in the absence of such provision a dangerous and unnecessary accumulation of money in the Treasury may occur during the next fiscal year," show beyond doubt that his intention was only to authorize the purchase of such bonds as it was optional with the Government to pay.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to my friend from Kentucky as an element of further certainty in that direction, that the Secretary who writes this letter states that the amendment suggested by him was copied from the refunding bill. The refunding bill of course had relation only to those bonds which were subject to the option of the Government, and none others.

Mr. BECK. It is plain that when this bill was passed it was not intended by the mover of the amendment nor by the Senate to vest the Secretary of the Treasury with any other power than he then had over bonds not payable at our option, especially not to extend the power to go into the open market and purchase bonds not payable at any premium he pleased. It was simply to allow the surplus revenue that would be in his hands to be applied beyond the necessities of the sinking fund to the purchase of any bonds of the United States then outstanding and payable, so as to prevent a contraction of the currency and loss of interest by an accumulation of surplus revenue before Congress could again meet. The language, however, is now construed to mean that he shall have a right beyond the necessities of the sinking fund, and, going beyond the bonds which are payable at the pleasure of the Government and without further authority from Congress, to purchase any outstanding bonds, whether due in 1891 or 1907, with surplus revenue at any premium he sees fit to give. In verification of that I desire to call attention to a few facts. One is this: We had a discussion on the 13th of December, 1883. When I was disputing the power to purchase bonds and arguing against the policy of allowing the Secretary, unless authorized by law, to go into the market and buy bonds, the Senator from Ohio, who had been the Secretary of the Treasury from whom we received the letter I have just read, said:

There is now no question about his power to purchase bonds. A law passed at a time when this Senate was Democratic, a law that was properly passed, upon the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the surplus revenue to the purchase and payment of bonds whenever he has any surplus so to apply. So there is no question of power; and it is no doubt his duty, whenever there is a surplus of revenue in the Treasury more than sufficient to meet the funds required by the resumption act and to pay off the silver certificates and the gold certificates and the other demand liabilities of the Government, to apply that surplus revenue to the purchase of the public debt, and he must make the best terms he can; he must buy in open market. If the debt bears but 3 per cent. interest he must pay it off. He has no option. He must go on and carry out that policy.

I repeat that latitude of power was not intended to be conferred by that act, even if the words taken literally do confer it, and such power never would have been given if it had been asked for. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report to this Congress said:

The only authority possessed by the Treasury whereby it can restore to business the surplus moneys thus accumulated is that given to the Secretary by the act of March 3, 1881, by which he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds. This can now be done to other than the 3 percents only by the payment of a large and increasing premium thereupon. And when it is considered that nearly one-half of the interest-bearing debt of the United States is held by national banks, State banks, savings-banks, and trust companies, and much other of it by private trustees and other persons acting in fiduciary capacity, who have no wish to surrender these securities, the difficulty of acting under the provision cited is manifest. Moreover, it cannot be assumed that the estimated surplus for the current and next years, under existing laws, will remain at the same rate in succeeding years. The increasing population and swelling business of the country will add to rather than take from the amount of the surplus as now estimated, while the decrease of interest on the public debt, and probably on the amount disbursed by the Pension Bureau as arrears of pensions are paid off, should diminish expenditures.

As a general principle, the good of the people requires that a public debt should be paid as soon as it may be without greatly onerous taxation or disturbance of business interests which have been fostered, perhaps stimulated, by provisions of law once expedient; though of the public debt resting upon us it is to be considered that the object for which it was in the main incurred was the good of coming generations as well as of that which incurred it, and that it is not unjust to them that, reaping a measure of the benefits it purchased, they should bear their share of the burden of payment. But as our interest-bearing public debt is over one billion and a quarter of dollars ($1,312,446,950 in exact figures), and about $250,000,000 and about $740,000,000 of it beyond our reach for payment for about eight years and twenty-four years, respectively, and may not be brought in by purchase, save at heavy rates of premium, even if it can by paying those rates, there is forced upon our attention the question, how shall a heaped-up surplus of public money be avoided? The discussion of this question in former reports of this Department admits of but one consistent answer from it now; the views therein expressed have not been given up. There ought to be a reduction of taxation.

I desire while calling attention to this bill to indorse what the Secretary of the Treasury has here said, that instead of keeping up taxation for the purpose of buying up these bonds at a premium, the duty of this Congress ought to be first to reduce taxation down to the wants of the Government; and in the next place I desire Congress to give the construction the law of 1881 was intended to have by those who aided in the passage of it, that is, to confine the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to the purchase of bonds that are payable at the option of the Government, and not authorize him to go into the market and buy those not due at any premium he pleases to pay. As there are still about $275,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds which can be so paid off, there is ample time for further legislation by this or future Congresses if necessary to give the Secretary of the Treasury such power as it may see fit to confer when any exigency may arise that requires the application of the surplus that he can not get rid of otherwise than by buying bonds at a premium.

The law of 1881 was passed to meet the then existing exigency of want of power, even to buy beyond the necessities of the sinking fund bonds that were payable at the option of the Government, and was not intended for any other purpose; but a broader construction is given to it. I think its language warrants it, both by the present Secretary and the preceding Secretary. I have introduced this bill and seek to refer it to the Finance Committee, to confine the Secretary's power to the bonds now payable, as was intended by all of us at the time the law was passed, hoping that we may be able then to address ourselves to the problem before us of reducing taxation, with the understanding that we are securing the stability of the national currency by making the bonds on which it is based permanent, and we will advise the taxpayers of the country that we will not merely for the purpose of keeping up unnecessary taxation draw in these bonds at any premium the holders may see fit to ask. We should doubtless increase the present high premium the very moment it is found that we have a surplus which must be applied in this way.

The 4 percents have gone from 21 to 24 per cent. premium in the last forty days by the hope that the banks were going to get more advantageous terms even than the bill reported to-day will give them. The moment we go into the market to buy them before maturity the holders will ask more, especially if provision is made that any Secretary we may chance to have shall buy them at any price he sees fit.

I have thought it proper to make these remarks, explanatory of the object I seek to accomplish. I now ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the bill is referred I desire to say a single word. It seems to me that the Senator from Kentucky is leaping before he comes to the stile. As long as we have any surplus, clearly it will be more economical for the Government to reduce its public debt than it will be to hold its funds on hand. For instance, it might be profitable for the Government to pay even a premium of 17 or 18 per cent. and redeem the 4 per cent. bonds and issue bonds instead at 3 per cent. If we have bonds out that are payable twenty-four years hence, we are not only compelled to pay the principal, but at 4 per cent. interest we have to pay 96 per cent. in addition. Therefore it will be much more economical, as it seems to me, for us to pay even a premium on our bonds whenever we have a surplus than to let the surplus lie idle in the Treasury. It strikes me therefore that the measure of the Senator from Kentucky is not one that he will approve of himself. The only thing is to wait and see whether we have or have not a surplus, and if we have it ought to be expended in the way that will be of most benefit to the Government of the United States. It is certainly a great compliment to the United States that our bonds, bearing as they do so small a rate of interest, are now sold in all markets for a high premium. I do not think that fact ought to be a subject of reproach or of regret.

Mr. BECK. I only desire that the law shall be construed as we all intended it, and that whatever power to buy bonds may be given hereafter shall be such as in the wisdom of Congress it is thought best to give. Instead of keeping up a surplus for the purpose of buying bonds at a premium when money is worth to the people 8 or 10 per cent. in their hands, I agree with the present Secretary of the Treasury that we ought to address ourselves to the reduction of taxation and allow the 4½ and 4 per cent. bonds, because we are going to pay all the threes in three and a half years, to be as permanent as the interests of the country require that they should, and not be agitating the market constantly through our Secretary offering enormous premiums for bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it seems to me that the suggestion of my friend from Vermont would lead to this necessary result: If as long as there is a surplus of revenue there is a power and a duty with the Secretary of the Treasury to buy in the bonds not due at any rate of premium, no matter how high it may be, we are obviously making it the interest of the bond-holding class of this country to keep up the taxation as high as it may be kept up in order that the surplus may be applied for their benefit in the enhanced premium. That will not do, Mr. President. There must be no such interest to keep up taxation in order that part of it may go into the pockets of those who enhance the premium upon Government obligations not for the purpose of sustaining the public credit but for the purpose of making money out of the Government obligations. It would be a very dangerous doctrine.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

WILLIAM L. WHITE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Calendar is in order; and the first bill will be reported.

The bill (S. 621) for the relief of William L. White was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to audit and allow the claim of William L. White for actual services performed by him as a clerk in the land office at Oregon City, Oreg., under contract with the register and the receiver thereof, to the amount of $1,333.33⅓, the balance due on the contract.

Mr. GARLAND. Is there a report with that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. That is a bill which has been reported twice from the Committee on Public Lands, and I think it passed the Senate at the last session. No written report accompanies the bill this time; but I have in my hand the report made on the 30th day of January, 1882, which if the reading is called for I shall ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the reading of the report called for?

Mr. PLUMB. Perhaps the report had better be read, as it is as brief as any statement I can make.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROVER, January 30, 1882:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 146) for the relief of William L. White, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

That the said William L. White was duly employed by the register of the land office at Oregon City, Oreg., from September 1, 1859, to 31st day of December, 1860, a period of sixteen months, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, amounting in all for said service to the sum of $2,000, on account of which there was paid by said office the sum of $666.66⅔, leaving a balance due said White for said services the sum of $1,333.33⅓, as appears by the certified copy of voucher and receipt furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the committee.

By the seventh section of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1856 (vol. 11, p. 91), the Secretary of the Interior "is authorized to allow, subject to the approval of Congress, such reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses incidental to said offices (registers and receivers) as he shall think just and proper, and report to Congress all such cases of allowance at each succeeding session, with estimate of the sum or sums required to pay the same. On August 16, 1860, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued a circular to all the local land offices in which he recited the above-quoted provision of law, and in reference thereto gave the following instructions to the registers and receivers of said offices, to wit:

"You will send on a statement showing the amount actually expended by you as a reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses over and above the allowance by said act of 1818 (the same simply referring to the salaries of the registers and receivers).

"You will prepare a statement in tabular form, showing the whole amount paid by you for this additional class of services, when and to whom, designating in each item the name of the party to whom paid and kind of service rendered, sending on the vouchers with your affidavit verifying the statement.

"Such data will enable this office to place the matter on just and favorable basis for the consideration of Congress."

Pursuant to said instructions under said act of Congress, on December 15, 1859, said register duly reported the services of said William L. White, and forwarded to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a certified statement of his account as herein set forth.

The occasion "for additional clerical service and extraordinary expenses" in the Oregon City land office appears to have been necessary work upon donation land certificates preparatory to patenting lands to settlers under the donation land law of Oregon of September 27, 1850, and the amendments thereto, a large number of which remained unissued for many years on account of the want of clerical force in said office.

It appears by a letter of May 18, 1880, from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him communicated to your committee at a former consideration of this claim, "that by act of Congress June 5, 1858, the sum of $7,000 was appropriated to reimburse the land offices at Oregon City and Winchester, Oreg., for expenses incurred by them in the employment of clerks necessary for the transaction of business of their respective offices, &c., but that the expenses actually incurred by them for this purpose exceeded the sum appropriated, and by direction of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, of date January 14, 1859, the amount appropriated was paid out to the clerks employed pro rata.

This accounts for the partial payment of this claim. No objection has been interposed by the Land Department to favorable action on this bill.

A similar bill has twice been favorably reported to the Senate by your committee heretofore, and twice passed the Senate without dissenting vote.

This is a case in which experienced and valuable clerical labor has been employed in the service of the United States by a public officer under authority of law and never compensated.

Senate bill 146 is therefore reported back, with recommendation that it pass with an amendment as stated in the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Kansas why this claim has not been paid before. I understand it is a claim originating in 1860.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir, it originated in 1860. I will state to the Senator that this claim has been pending before Congress since nearly that time, and has passed this body two or three times. Oregon has been until very recently a long way off; communication has been more or less interrupted, and I have no doubt for the time being the party may have considered the settlement made with him as all he could get. But the policy of the Government in regard to these matters changed. The service was rendered under a contract, which was regarded at that time as valid until the instruction of the Interior Department. As soon as he could in the ordinary way prefer his claim he did so, and it has been pending for twelve or fifteen years in Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT SMITH MILITARY RESERVATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 258) donating a part of the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Ark., to the city of Fort Smith, for the use and benefit of the free public schools thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALKER. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WALKER on the 7th instant:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 258) donating a part of the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Ark., to the city of Fort Smith, for the use and benefit of the free public schools thereof, and for other purposes, report the same back, and recommend that the bill be passed.

The military reservation at Fort Smith has long since been abandoned for military purposes, there being no need of a fort or garrison at or near that location. This fact appearing, Congress, by act of February 24, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of useless military reservations," directed its transfer from the War Department to the Interior Department, which was done on the 25th of March, 1871.

By executive order dated May 22, 1871, so much of the reservation as was occupied by a national cemetery was reserved from sale and restored to the custody of the War Department, and by executive order dated December 3, 1875, additional land was reserved for said cemetery. The garrison buildings remaining within the walls of the fort are now serving the Government a useful purpose, the courts for the western district of Arkansas being held therein.

Ample grounds are within these walls for any other and far more extended buildings than the Government will ever consent to construct or need at that point, no matter what progress may be made in the adjacent country. This and also the land reserved as a national cemetery are excepted from the grant provided by this bill.

The city of Fort Smith lies alongside this reservation, and one of its streets—Garrison avenue—where it nears the Arkansas River, encroaches upon the reservation, so that a small portion thereof is within it and a part of the wharf is upon it.

The bill provides that so much of the reservation as is occupied by Garrison avenue and by the wharf of the city of Fort Smith be donated to said city, to be used as an avenue and wharf; that an amount of said reservation not exceeding 9 acres be granted to the city, to be used for public buildings and county courthouse for the Fort Smith district of Sebastian County and for a public park; and the city of Fort Smith is required to lay off, and for all time keep in repair, a street or avenue 60 feet wide leading to the front gate of the national cemetery, or the 9 acres of land so granted is to revert to the United States.

That the city shall as soon as may be after the passage of the act cause the reservation granted to be divided into lots and blocks corresponding as near as possible with the plat of said city; that all streets, avenues, and alleys laid out on such part of the avenue as is granted by this bill be granted to the city, to be held for the use of the public; that the remainder of such reservation be granted to the city of Fort Smith, to be held in trust for the benefit of the free public schools of the school district of said city, the city being required within ten years after the grant to cause the land to be sold in single lots at public sale for cash to the highest bidder, the purchase price to be paid from time to time as sales are made to the treasurer of the school board of such school district, to be used by the board in the erection of school-houses, for the pay of teachers, and the maintenance of public schools in said district.

It is provided also that persons having fractional lots fronting on Garrison avenue in said city shall have the right to purchase, within two years from the passage of the act, at private sale, so much of the reservation as shall be necessary to extend their respective fractional lots back a distance of 140 feet, at the rate per square foot that the lots on the reservation nearest such fractional lot may sell for at public sale. In making disposition of the reservation this appears to be just, inasmuch as the reservation line for a time had been uncertain and purchases were made and buildings erected when it was believed to be elsewhere. This is evidenced by the fact that the principal street of the city is located upon a part of it.

The Government derives no benefit whatever from said reservation or any part thereof, except that portion withheld by the provisions of this bill. The reservation remaining in its present condition, undisposed of, is an obstruction to the growth and prosperity of the city of Fort Smith, by the capital and industry of whose citizens in erecting buildings and making improvements near the reservation its value has been mostly enhanced.

From the memorial presented by the committee appointed by the board of school directors of the school district referred to it appears that by a census taken in August, 1881, there are in such district children between the ages of 6 and 20 years, white and colored, 1,221; that since that time there has been an increase of 100, making 1,321 of scholastic age; that the amount derived from city and State taxation is inadequate to afford means for the education of more than one-third of this number.

As the Government derives no benefit from the land embraced in the grant, and the proceeds arising from the sale thereof in the manner and for the use and benefit proposed will greatly aid in the education of the children of said school district, the committee are of opinion that the bill proposes just and proper legislation.

Mr. HOAR. I should like the attention of some member of the committee that reported this bill. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] has it in charge. I see that this bill, in the second section, requires the city of Fort Smith forever to keep in repair certain streets and avenues which it is to lay out, and upon a failure to do that the whole land grant is forfeited to the United States. It also requires the city to sell the land to purchasers who probably will be householders, so that these people will take their title, erect their dwellings or stores or whatever else they erect upon the land upon a perpetual condition subsequent, that their title shall be forfeited if the city fails to perform a certain provision of the bill. It seems to me that that would be a very unjust arrangement.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, the title once vested remains in the party purchasing. It is only in regard to the unsold lands that the reversion is to take place. The title once vested will not be divested by a subsequent failure.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator please read for himself lines 14 and 15 of section 2? Does the Senator understand that the nine acres do not include the portion of the reservation to be sold? I should like to have the Senator or some member of the committee also state why this is given; whether if the Boston navy-yard shall be abandoned for naval purposes it is also the purpose to convey that to the city of Boston.

Mr. PLUMB. The committee did not have under consideration the Boston navy-yard, and consequently I can not answer as to that particular tract of land; but I can state briefly the theory upon which the committee proceeded.

Fort Smith is located upon the boundaries of the State of Arkansas and the Indian reservation. It is a reservoir, so to speak, of a large floating population, ignorant and vicious to an extreme degree, half-breeds, Indians of various degrees of intermixture with white blood, and Indians of full blood. This town has had the burden of the control of this class of people for many years. It has also had the burden of educating a more than usually large number of this class of people by reason of its proximity to a section of country where educational facilities were limited, and which therefore voided upon it, so to speak, a large number of persons to be educated in excess of that which applies to communities otherwise located.

In addition to that, whatever value this piece of land has beyond its value for agricultural purposes is due to the energy, to the enterprise, to the investment of the people of Fort Smith. They have given it value, and for many years the proper and legitimate growth of the town has been interrupted and hindered seriously by reason of the fact that this reservation lay close up against it in such a way that it could not extend itself accordingly as it would have done if this land had been subject to sale.

Besides, the committee was to some extent responsive to the opinion expressed here and elsewhere in regard to the unsettled condition of things existing in the Southern States which has evoked so much attention from Congress in the way of appropriations for educational purposes to the States in which a large black population exists, a population which is of necessity very ignorant.

These were the considerations which moved the committee to report this bill. The reservation is not needed for military purposes. If it were exposed to sale and the Government was compelled to pay out of the proceeds the sum of money which would represent the increase in value which the labor and the investment of the people of Forth Smith has heretofore put upon this particular piece of land, there would be but a small amount to go into the Treasury of the United States. It was thought, considering the exceptional condition of things surrounding that community, it were better to be generous and fair, and not to cut a small pattern or to deal with them in a close way, but, inasmuch as the situation was exceptional, to give them the full benefit to grow out of the donation to them of this tract of land.

Mr. HOAR. I know I am violating the rule, and if I have spoken part of five minutes once, I ask for enough of time to make up that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is not entitled to be recognized unless by unanimous consent, he having spoken once. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts speaking again on this question? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I am obliged to the Senate for its consent, but I do not conceive that I am violating the spirit of the rule, as I rose first to ask a question, and did not occupy more than half a minute in doing it. The Chair is right in saying that I am violating the letter of the rule without consent.

It does not seem to me that the consideration that value has been added to this land by these people is of very great force, because that is true of all Government land situated in the neighborhood of any growing community. The other reasons stated by the Senator from Kansas seem to me forcible. I move to amend the bill by adding at the end of the first section—

And to be applied to the benefit of all children of school age, without distinction of race.

The Senator states that this is intended largely for the benefit of Indian and colored children.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I do not enter into the question whether they are educated at separate schools or together, but I want to provide in some way that each race shall have its equal share of the benefits.

Mr. WALKER. I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas can not accept the amendment, as the bill is before the Senate. It is the duty of the Chair to put the question on the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very appropriate amendment to this enactment, for we have there a colony of negroes and a colony of Indians who have assembled in the vicinity of Fort Smith and occupy part of this reservation as squatters, as I understand, and that is one of the main reasons why the citizens of that community desire that this land be passed into private ownership.

My impressions about the bill have been derived almost entirely from correspondence with the citizens, amongst others with the judge of the United States court there, who seems to be a philanthropic and public-spirited man, and he desires that this area of reserved land shall go into the city limits, and that the city shall have an opportunity of extending itself over this plain.

Fort Smith is an important town in a great many particulars, and has a good commerce and fine prospects for the future, and it is of great service, I think, to the Government and the people of the United States as an outpost of civilization on the border of the Indian Territory; and so I consider are all the towns around the Indian Territory. Good influences ought to pass from those towns into that Territory, and really we are doing more to civilize and improve the Indians than we are aware of. We established courts there on the southern border of Kansas; we have a court also at Fort Smith for the trial of criminals and for the investigation of offenses and crimes in the Indian Territory.

These people have gone on and expended their money and improved the property in the vicinity of this reservation, as the Government has been holding it without having any actual necessity for it as a military reservation. It seems to me that it is an act of public justice as well as of public benefaction to allow this land to pass into private ownership, and the proceeds to go into a school fund for the use of all persons, without distinction of race or color.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the report is silent as to the area of this reservation. It would be interesting to know how many acres it contains. It appears from the bill that nine acres are to be reserved for the erection of public buildings and for the use of a park for the inhabitants of the city, and that the remainder is to be disposed of for the benefit of the public schools of Fort Smith. Can the Senator advise us how many acres there are in the entire reservation?

Mr. WALKER. Two hundred and ninety-odd.

Mr. INGALLS. Two hundred and ninety acres.

Mr. GARLAND. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is proper enough, but I suppose the committee who reported the bill considered that the present constitution and school laws of Arkansas are ample on that question. Still, for one, I am willing to let that go in.

Now, I would suggest a verbal amendment in section 2, line 28, which reads, "for the pay of teachers and the maintenance of the public schools." I would insert "free" after the word "the," so as to read, "the free public schools in said district;" so as to carry out the purpose.

I would state, in addition to what the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] have stated, that this bill was passed by the Senate some two years ago identically in the form it is now with the same report. There was no opposition to it except that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] asked that it go over one day until he could look into it. He examined it and the next day withdrew the objection. The act of Congress reserving this reservation specifies the number of acres and the area by metes and bounds. I offer the amendment which I indicated in order to carry out to the fullest extent the purport of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will not be in order until the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts shall have been disposed of. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts being adopted if the Senators from Arkansas do not object to it; but I do not see how that amendment can be carried into effect. It provides that the proceeds of this land shall be applied to the education of all children of school age without distinction as to race or color. Suppose all those children do not desire to avail themselves of the advantages of a school education, how is it to be applied? I think the Senator ought to amend his amendment by saying "such of the children as shall see proper to avail themselves of an education." I do not see how this fund can be diverted from a strict application to all the children of school age under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to point out to him that the language which I used is qualified by what already is in the bill. Perhaps he did not observe that it is to be held for the use and benefit of the free public schools in the school district of Fort Smith, to be applied without distinction of race. I suppose of course that means only such children as are in the free public schools. They make their own regulations about that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then, I again say, I have no objection to the amendment, as the Senators from Arkansas do not object. Still I do think it is unnecessary on all occasions to be attempting to regulate here the local concerns of every community. I should be perfectly willing to trust the management of this fund to the people of the town of Fort Smith without the interference of Congress or the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator as to the manner in which they shall apply the money. I would trust the people of New England or of Kansas or of any other State, and I think we had as well leave the management of their local affairs entirely to the people of the different sections of this country and not undertake to impose our own particular views upon the people of every section of the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] moves an amendment in section 2, line 28, after the word "the," where it occurs in the second place, to insert "free;" so as to read, "the free public schools."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL RETIRED LIST.

The bill (S. 178) to repeal section 714 of the Revised Statutes, allowing pensions to judges in certain cases, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PUGH. There is an adverse report from the Committee on the Judiciary on that bill. I am requested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] who introduced the bill to ask that it lie on the table, and he will call it up at a future day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Alabama that this bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts;" which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report with that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. HILL. I will state that this bill has passed the Senate in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses. It has been examined by the committee very carefully. There is no report filed now. There was a report made on the bill at the last session, which I suppose will answer the purpose, if the Senator desires to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Colorado that there is a report at this session.

Mr. HILL. The same report that was made last year was adopted by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HILL January 7, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred S. 74, "to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled 'An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts,'" has had the same under consideration, and reports it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I offer the amendment which I submitted a few days ago, and which is simply to admit California to the provisions of this bill as respects indemnity for the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections taken as mineral lands.

Mr. HOAR. Has that been before the committee?

Mr. MILLER, of California. The amendment has been submitted to the members of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Have the committee passed upon it?

Mr. MILLER, of California. They have passed upon it individually. There can not possibly be any objection to it, because California is in the same position as Colorado.

Mr. HOAR. But it seems to me that a provision of this character conferring a new right to public lands, however proper it may seem on its face, ought not to be coupled with a provision of even a similar character relating to another State by mere amendment, unless it has in some way substantially received the same consideration of the committee. If the Senator says he has submitted it to the members of this committee and has their approbation without the formality of a meeting, I shall not object; but I should object otherwise.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I understand it has been submitted to the chairman and other members of the committee, and there is a bill introduced by me for the benefit of California, which is before the committee. I desire to put these States on an equal footing in this respect and have them both in one bill. I ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any objection to my amendment? I do not think there can possibly be any objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, and an act entitled "An act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1853, shall be construed as giving to the States of Colorado and California, respectively, the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as may have been or shall be found to be mineral lands: Provided, That such selections shall be made from lands anywhere within the States of Colorado and California, respectively, returned as agricultural, and upon which at the date of selection no valuable mineral discoveries have been made; and all such selections shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall, if he is satisfied such lands so selected are not mineral, so certify, and thereupon the right of said States to such selected lands shall finally attach; and the Secretary of the Interior shall also ascertain whether any of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections are mineral lands, and shall certify their character, which certificate shall determine the matter.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the deputy surveyor, at the time of executing the survey of any township, to make a critical examination of the character of sections 16 and 36, and to embrace in his field-notes a full report of any and all mineral discoveries found to the surveyor-general, who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior whether the whole or any part of either of said sections is mineral in character.

SEC. 3. That the State of Colorado, in selecting lands for agricultural-college purposes under the acts of July 2, 1864, and July 23, 1866, may select an amount of land equal to 30,000 acres for each Senator and Representative which said State is entitled to in Congress, from any public land in said State not double-minimum priced land, or selections may be made from said double-minimum lands; but in the latter case the lands are to be computed at the maximum price and the number of acres proportionally diminished; but no mineral lands shall be selected.

SEC. 4. That whenever there shall exist a deficiency of school lands in any township for which the State of California may be entitled to select indemnity lands under the provisions of this or of any previous act, such indemnity lands may be selected in any land district in the State.

Mr. CONGER. Let me inquire whether there is any restriction upon taking lands on which settlers or occupants, under any title or claim of title, may have settled and made improvements.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The previous acts determine how the land shall be taken. The States cannot take lands that belong to settlers.

Mr. HILL. They are obliged to take lands subject to entry.

Mr. CONGER. My inquiry was whether there was sufficient protection in this bill against States taking under this bill any lands upon which settlers or even squatters might have made improvements, without guarding the rights of such settlers? I think that provision should accompany all new grants of land or new selections to be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that amendment and its scope, and to know whether California has not already received land, and if this is not an additional gratuity. Let there be some explanation of the reason why the amendment should prevail.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This is not an additional gratuity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has once addressed the Senate; he asks unanimous consent to address it again on this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This is not an additional grant of land to the State of California. The amendment refers to sections set apart as mineral lands which were the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections heretofore granted to the State for school purposes, and this only provides that where the school sections have been set apart as mineral lands the State shall have the right to select other lands under the provisions of the act donating those lands; that is to say, any lands that are open to entry and that have not been pre-empted or homesteaded or settled upon may be taken in any part of the State to make up the quantity of lands which the State has been deprived of by reason of these reservations for mineral purposes. That is all there is of it. It is certainly just and proper that these States should have the full amount of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections within their limits for schooling purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Suppose a settler has merely squatted upon land, and has not attempted to perfect his title under any of the land laws of the United States, could the land so occupied by this squatter be taken under the provisions of the amendment?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I suppose not. A bona fide settler on the public lands is protected by the land laws of the United States in his possession, I understand. This does not change the land system at all. It only permits the State to make selections of land open to settlement under the land laws of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if California has not already heretofore had this deficiency made up to her.

Mr. MILLER, of California. She has not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has there been no legislation of that kind?

Mr. MILLER, of California. There has been legislation of one sort and another in regard to school lands, but none, as I understand it, to give the State the right of selection in place of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections reserved as mineral lands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say to the Senator that my understanding has been that the loss of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to California has substantially been made up by subsequent legislation.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If it has been then the State would get nothing under this legislation. It is only to give her that to which she would be entitled; and if she has not been deprived of any of her lands for school purposes she takes nothing under this act. It is only to make up the amount she has been deprived of. The same is true of Colorado.

Mr. HARRISON. I dislike to oppose anything that the Senator from California advocates here specially unless I know some good reason to urge against it; but it seems to me that this ought not to come in in the form of an amendment to a bill which has been considered by a committee and reported; that the right course to take to give the relief to California which the Senator thinks she is entitled to in reference to her school lands would be to introduce an independent bill, let it go to a committee and have consideration there, and come back to us with what information the committee can give upon the subject.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I stated that that had been done already; such a bill is before the Committee on Public Lands, but this bill coming up, and the case being similar to that of Colorado, I could see no impropriety in moving the amendment. I consulted members of the committee about it and no objection was made, but on the contrary it was thought to be eminently proper that California should be admitted into this bill, and have the same rights and privileges as Colorado.

Mr. HARRISON. If, then, the question is before the committee for consideration now on a bill which the Senator has introduced, it seems to me he will not be put at a disadvantage, and the rest of us will feel a little more comfortable in supporting what I have no doubt he will be able to demonstrate to us is a correct measure when it has formally received the sanction of the committee that has it in charge.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has already twice addressed the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to proceed again. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If there is any danger of the bill of the Senator from Colorado being imperiled by my amendment, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. This bill will go over of its own motion in two minutes. It will hold its place then on the Calendar and come up, no objection being made to it, on Monday morning, and meantime the committee will be able to say formally whether they approve this amendment. They meet on Monday morning, and if they do approve it that will remove the objection and make it all right.

Mr. HILL. If the bill will go over without prejudice, I have no objection to its going over to Monday morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not be better to have it printed with the proposed amendment?

Mr. HILL. The proposed amendment is in the nature of a substitute. It has been printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will take it, although it lacks one minute of 2 o'clock, that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. That leaves this bill for consideration to-morrow, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

PRINTING OF FINANCIAL STATEMENTS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Indiana to allow me to have an order made to print a document that is useful and necessary for the Committee on Finance, and it should be printed to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit the following order:

Ordered, That 500 copies of the interview of the Committee on Finance with Hon. John Jay Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, on Senate bills 20, 1050, and 1155 be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. GARLAND. Has that interview been reported to the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL. No; we ask to have it printed for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. HARRISON. In the reprint of the bill with the amendments which have been adopted the Secretary has called my attention to the fact that in section 5, line 29, the words "and commisioners to be" are printed as though that phrase had been adopted as part of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. That is a mistake simply in the print. It does not appear in the official copy at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Indiana to say that in line 29, section 5, of the reprint, the words "and commissioners to be" are an error?

Mr. HARRISON. They are an error. They were not in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is so informed at the desk. In the official paper those words do not occur.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask leave to propose several amendments, with a view of conforming the bill in some of its provisions to the amendment which was adopted yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. In section 7, line 15, after the word "involved," I move to insert "in any civil case;" so as to read:

When the amount involved in any civil case is $200 or more.

As the clause reads now line 15 relates to both civil and criminal cases, and it is not of course a right description of a criminal case to speak of an amount of money as being involved. I will follow that amendment with another in the next line, which will make it conform.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As this is an amendment already agreed to, the Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to move an amendment in line 15, section 7. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. At the end of line 15, of section 7, after the word "more," I move to insert "and in any criminal case where a fine of more than $100 or imprisonment is imposed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this amendment? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Section 9 of the bill was amended, as I have already said, on motion of the Senator from Nebraska, so as to require the fees received by these officers to be turned into the Treasury of the United States. That amendment will make it necessary to increase somewhat the salaries, and I will propose in a moment some amendments in that direction.

It is impossible that the committee could now determine upon the salary which the marshal of such a district as this should be entitled to provided he has to pay out of his salary all his traveling expenses. In executing writs of the court it will no doubt be necessary for the marshal to make long journeys, to hire a canoe and a crew of Indians to paddle him some hundreds of miles along the coast, and if we allow him a salary and make no provision for fees or mileage for such a trip it is not likely that the sum named in the bill will more than defray the expenses of his office, leaving him absolutely nothing for his own services.

The committee therefore have suggested increasing some of the salaries. They have determined to report to the Senate an amendment allowing actual traveling expenses, to be reported under oath by these officers, to be approved as to the marshal and district attorney by the judge of the court, and as to the judge's own traveling expenses an account of them is to be rendered to the Attorney-General and approved by him. We think this establishes as good guards about these expenditures as we could make.

I shall have to ask unanimous consent to offer some of these amendments, as amendments of the committee are to be amended which have already been adopted. The first amendment is in section 9, line 14, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred dollars;" so as to read:

The attorney, the sum of $2,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). That is an amendment to the text and is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. It appears so in the reprinted bill, but in the original bill it was "$2,500" and the amendment proposed by the committee to reduce the amount $500 was adopted. This is a proposition to reinstate it, so that of course it requires unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is upon agreeing to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In line 15 of section 9, after the word "thousand," I ask leave to insert the words "five hundred dollars;" so as to read:

The marshal, the sum of $2,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted without objection.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 9, line 17, after the word "thousand," I move to insert the words "five hundred;" so as to read:

And the clerk, the sum of $2,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted without objection.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 9, line 18, after the word "States," I move to insert:

The said district judge, marshal, and district attorney shall be paid their actual necessary expenses when traveling in the discharge of their official duties. A detailed account shall be rendered of such expenses under oath, and as to the marshal and district attorney such account shall be approved by the judge, and as to his expenses by the Atttorney-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. At the beginning of line 23 I move to strike out "$500" and insert "$1,000." That is the provision for the salaries of the commissioners, upon whom very important judicial functions are devolved. Under the bill we gave them $500 apiece. Under the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska the fees have been taken from them, and upon a conference in the committee we have agreed to recommend that the salaries be increased to $1,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to increase the salary of the commissioners from $500 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 9, line 24, in order to make the bill harmonious, I move to strike out, after the word "fees," the words "as deputy United States marshals and;" so as to read:

The deputy marshals, in addition to the usual fees of constables in Oregon, shall receive each a salary of $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 9, line 25, I move to strike out $500 and insert $750. This is the salary of the deputy marshals, who are to be the constables and executive officers of the commissioners' courts. We increase it $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I desired to propose an amendment to the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but I see that the correction has already been made. The correction I desired to make was to strike off the letter "s" in "commissioners," in line 17 of section 7. It relates to the approval of the appeal bonds; it should read "to be approved by the court or commissioner." Of course it is not intended that all of the commissioners should approve an appeal bond, but that any one of them might do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be adopted without objection.

Mr. HARRISON. That, I believe, completes any amendments that have been suggested by the committee.

Mr. LAPHAM. After the word "commissioner," in line 17 of section 7, in the reprint of the bill, I move to add:

Writs of error in criminal cases shall issue to the said district court from the United States circuit court for the district of Oregon in the cases provided in chapter 176 of the laws of 1879; and the jurisdiction thereby conferred upon circuit courts is hereby given to the circuit court of Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. LAPHAM. My object in offering the amendment is to apply the provisions of an act, framed, as I said the other day, when I was a member of the other House, providing for a rehearing on a writ of error of criminal cases tried in the district court where the sentence is imprisonment, or if a fine only, where the fine shall exceed the sum of $300, in the circuit court of the district where the trial is had. That act was very carefully prepared. It provides for the settlement of the bill of exceptions at the trial, the presentation of the bill of exceptions to the circuit judge or circuit justice in term or vacation, who on consideration of the importance and difficulty of the questions presented in the record may allow a writ of error. It does not give a writ of error as a matter of right. It vests in the circuit court simply a discretion in important cases where manifest error has been committed to allow a review in the circuit court.

The bill provides that the district court in this Territory may exercise a power which is not given to the district courts of the United States in any other instance that I know of, and that is to try in the first instance capital cases. It may try a man and send him to execution, and there is no mode, whatever error or errors may have been committed in the trial, by which the accused can have any rehearing of his case.

In minor criminal cases which are triable in the district court grave questions may arise, questions of constitutional law, and there is no mode of reviewing them provided in this bill unless we make, as I propose in the amendment, the provisions of the law of 1879 applicable to this case. I am unable to see any possible objection to doing this. This a far-off Territory, where trials may be conducted in haste, where wrongs to individuals may result in criminal trials for which there ought to be some mode of redress. By the terms of this measure they are denied any redress whatever unless the provisions of the law of 1879 are made applicable to the case.

I do not desire to say anything in reference to the matter unless there shall be objection to the amendment. I can hardly conceive that there is any ground for objection. I hope the Senator from Indiana will assent to its being adopted. It will not in all probability result in many if any cases going to the circuit court in Oregon, but if a flagrant case should occur where gross injustice is being done to an individual that remedy would be left to him and a review could be had.

I select the circuit court of Oregon for the reason that in all the other provisions of this bill the laws of Oregon are made applicable to the trials in the district court and in the commissioners' courts, so that the circuit court of Oregon is the proper tribunal to grant a writ of error in the case presented to it, and to hear the case upon the merits if the writ of error is allowed.

My amendment also, as will be seen, provides for adding the words "and circuit" in the middle of line 18 of the seventh section. It now reads:

And the final judgments or decrees of said district court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I ask to add the words "and circuit;" so as to read:

And the final judgments or decrees of said circuit and district court.

I do that simply to provide for one class of cases. Suppose in the circuit court there should be a certificate of division upon a question of constitutional law.

Mr. HARRISON. A certificate of division in what circuit court?

Mr. LAPHAM. In the circuit court of Oregon. Then the case is one which ought to go to the Supreme Court and would go by law to the Supreme Court. Therefore I ask to make it read that the final judgments or decrees of said circuit and district court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States in such cases. That simply provides for the exceptional case of a certificate of division upon a constitutional question, which necessarily, if properly provided for, would bring the case up.

Mr. GARLAND. The statute of 1879, as stated by the Senator from New York, changed the practice in reference to a good many districts. Take for example the western district of Arkansas.

Mr. LAPHAM. It changed the practice as to all district courts, did it not?

Mr. GARLAND. The law simply gave them the general jurisdiction of a circuit court, but no provision was made until the act of 1879, to which attention has been called by the Senator from New York, to have a review of criminal cases. In reading his amendment, although I believe it comports, as far as I am able to judge at this instant, with the law of 1879 and the general law, it resolves itself purely into a question of convenience. As one representing the committee in part, I have no objection to the amendment, since it tallies with the law of 1879 and gives the party a review, if in the discretion of the circuit judge of Oregon he thinks he is entitled to it, upon such terms as the law prescribes.

Mr. LAPHAM. It is left entirely in his discretion.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no particular objection, for one, to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York also moves in section 7, line 18, of the amended bill, after the word "said," to insert the words "circuit and;" so as to read:

And the final judgments or decrees of said circuit and district court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases.

The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The second section declares "that there shall be appointed for the said district a governor, who shall reside therein during his term of office." The bill nowhere provides for a term of office. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that there should be a term provided for the governor and all the other officers named in the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. A Territorial office is fixed at four years by the general law.

Mr. MILLER, of California. In section 9, lines 4, 5, and 6, it is provided that these officers "shall hold their respective offices for the term of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified."

Mr. INGALLS. I had overlooked that. I suggest the insertion of the word "annual" before the word "salary" in line 13, section 9; so as to read:

They shall receive respectively the following annual salaries.

As the bill now reads, these officers would be entitled to receive the entire amount every three months.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the bill, if in order, by striking out the fourteenth section.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the amendment proposed?

Mr. CALL. I want to raise the question of the power of Congress to pass an act prohibiting the importation into the Territory of Alaska of any commercial article which is admitted by law into other parts of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that the amendment is not in order now as in Committee of the Whole, section 14 having been adopted as an entirety. It will be in order after the bill shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Very well; I will then reserve the question on that amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose we had better act upon the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, and if any one amendment is reserved the question may be taken upon the others together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate with certain amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the question now is on concurring in the amendments as reported. Is a separate vote required? ["No."]

Mr. CALL. I understood that the question upon concurring in section 14 would be reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Let all the other amendments be acted upon in gross. ["Agreed."]

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he simply reserve that particular section for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. CALL. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the wish of the Senate as to the other amendments? Shall there be separate votes or shall they be adopted as an entirety? ["In bulk."] Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole with the exception of section 14 be now concurred in?

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question is on concurring in the amendment adding as an additional section section 14 to the bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the fourteenth section as agreed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole provides:

That the provisions of chapter 3, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the unorganized Territory of Alaska, shall remain in full force, except as herein specially otherwise provided; and the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district, except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes, is hereby prohibited, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits; and the President of the United States shall make such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

I am entirely willing to support any proper measures of a police nature, as it is termed, for the purpose of subjecting the traffic in spirituous liquors to such conditions and regulations as will limit or prevent its injurious effects in the Territories, but our action here must be kept within the limit of our constitutional authority and power. To accomplish this end we have no right to violate our oaths and our constitutional duty.

My objection to that section is that it is not within our constitutional power to adopt it. The Constitution of the United States, as I submitted yesterday to the Senate, provides that all duties and imposts shall be uniform throughout the United States. Upon a very slight inquiry and examination into the subject this morning I find, as I supposed was the case, that has been well settled in the previous judicial construction of the Constitution throughout the country. It has been decided both by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the State courts always that there can not be any imposition of a prohibitory tax or a prohibition upon the exports in the interstate commerce from one State into another State under the Constitution. Both in regard to foreign importations and the exports or commerce from one State to another State the Constitution is clear and unmistakable.

The construction of the Constitution which has been placed upon it both by commentators and courts leaves no doubt upon that subject. There is not a single decision of the Supreme Court to the contrary. The Senator from Arkansas cited yesterday a decision of a district court in Oregon (Judge Deady presiding) affirming the constitutionality of a law similar to this. That would be no authority to govern the reason and conscience of the Senate; but it is not sustained by reason or argument or authority. The counsel for the defense in the case submitted to the court the proposition that Congress could not abdicate its legislative power and confer it on the President, and the judge says that this is a most extraordinary proposition and one for which no authority is cited. The authority is abundant, but it ought not to have needed authority for a self-evident proposition. Where does Congress derive the authority to prohibit commerce between the States? Where to prohibit commerce between foreign nations and the United States? Where to declare that shall not be property which the States make property, excepting only slaves?

There is not a single authority nor can there be a reasonable argument made in support of this proposition. I am aware that there has been a statute declaring this to be the law for many years in relation to this Territory, but the Constitution is supreme and the statute of no force.

Mr. BAYARD. While the Senator from Florida is looking for his authority I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana is there a port of entry in Alaska?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not able to answer the Senator certainly. I think the port of Sitka was made a port of entry. Whether it is continued as such I do not know.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Alaska is a collection district with Sitka as a port of entry with a collector of customs, and there are three ports of delivery, I think.

Mr. BAYARD. Sitka is a port of entry by law?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 2, page 463, section 966, writes as follows:

SEC. 996. The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It, consequently, extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words which modify the grant. These words are "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia, or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

* * * * * * *

This language is perfectly clear, and the reasons which sustained it equally so. The commentator further on cites and reviews a leading case in the Supreme Court from Maryland where a law of this State sought to evade this provision of the Constitution, and the court at great length examines all the reasoning on the subject, both the reasons which sustain the objects of the power granted to Congress and the limitation of it, and the conditions imposed that duties or imposts shall be uniform or the same in all the States and Territories. I will not detain the Senate by reading the case. The question is too plain for argument. You can not have duties uniform and in one place have a duty and in another have none. You cannot admit articles in one place and prohibit them in another.

SEC. 1010. The next clause in the Constitution is:

"No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

SEC. 1011. The obvious object of those provisions is to prevent any possibility of applying the power to lay taxes or regulate commerce injuriously to the interests of any one State, so as to favor or aid another. If Congress were allowed to lay a duty on exports from any one State, it might unreasonably injure, or even destroy, the staple productions or common articles of that State. The inequality of such a tax would be extreme. In some of the States the whole of their means result from agricultural exports. In others, a great portion is derived from other sources; from external fisheries, from freights, and from the profits of commerce in its largest extent. The burden of such a tax would, of course, be very unequally distributed. The power is, therefore, wholly taken away to intermeddle with the subject of exports. On the other hand preferences might be given to the ports of one State by regulations either of commerce or revenue, which might confer on them local facilities or privileges in regard to commerce or revenue.

Does not the case of an importation by act of Congress of certain articles in one place and their prohibition in another confer a preference—a special privilege on the citizens of the place where the articles are admitted over the citizens of the place where it is prohibited? Surely this is too plain for argument. This is a regulation of commerce—a preference of one port over another. It can not be called a police regulation.

It would seem, therefore, that under these two clauses of the Constitution there could be no provision of law enacted by which a preference shall be made between the citizens of one State or Territory and those of another. Unquestionably if there be a duty and an admission of an imported article in New York under a rate of tax and in California or Alaska (which under this decision is the same) it be admitted free or prohibited altogether, there is a preference; there can not be uniformity. Either the prohibition must be uniform or the tax or duty must be uniform.

In this case the general law provides for an admission of the importation upon the payment of a duty everywhere except in Alaska. This bill provides that in that portion of the territory of the United States contained within the unorganized Territory of Alaska there shall be no admission of this importation; that the importation of spirits shall be altogether prohibited; and it provides that there shall be no export (using the word in the sense of the transit of the productions of one State into another) from any State of the United States into the Territory of Alaska of this article of commerce.

The question is whether on the principle of uniformity required in the Constitution this act which makes an absolute prohibition and confers a preference of one State or Territory over another would be constitutional and its exercise of power valid.

Upon the question of the right of property the Supreme Court in the much-discussed and somewhat criticised case known as the Dred Scott case decided that a citizen going into a Territory carried with him whatever constitutional rights or inhibitions against the exercise of unconstitutional power affecting him in his personal property which existed in any other part of the United States, and that the citizen of the Territory possessed all the rights in regard to his person and his property, or his commercial rights, which he had when he was under the protection of State law; that the Constitution entered the Territory with him and protected him in all his rights. Nothing can be clearer than the proposition that Territorial sovereignty carries with it all other attributes of sovereignty belonging to a government, according to the form of its government and the limitations imposed on the exercise of its powers. It can not change the nature of its powers because of the locality in which they are exercised.

If these propositions are true, it can not be that we have a right to prohibit any commerce which would be a lawful commerce or the transportation of any property which would be a lawful property, under our Constitution and laws, from one State into another.

As I said yesterday, the provision in regard to the Indian Territory is an exceptional one and is not related to nor does it in any respect resemble that of the Territory of Alaska. It rests upon its own peculiar and admitted ground, being the reservation of a Territory the Indian title to which was extinguished upon certain conditions. It is reserved from the operation of our laws and from settlement by our people.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I would submit to the honorable Senator from Indiana who has charge of this measure, whether as Sitka has been made by act of Congress a port of entry it is competent in this bill to prohibit importation or to destroy the absolute uniformity that the Constitution requires for the imposition of all taxes, excises, and imposts. It is true that the language of the Constitution prevents a preference to ports of one State over the ports of another State. All that, however, is but in accord with the great doctrine that was decided in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, that the commerce of the United States is one commerce and that our people are a unit as to their commerce. It was, as I have always understood, the great result reached by that decision of the Supreme Court, that there was but one commerce, and that of the United States.

As it has pleased the Government of the United States to make Sitka, a port within Alaska Territory, a port of entry, it seems to me very questionable whether you can apply a different feature of revenue laws to that port over any other port of the United States. It is true that Alaska is not a State; it is as yet a part of the unorganized territory of the United States; but the question is also new to me as to the application of that feature of the Constitution which prohibits preferences being given. I submit that if you can exclude importation, which creates an inequality, you can vary duties, which would create an inequality, and so in that way, as there is free trade absolutely between all portions of the United States interiorly, you might force all trade into one port, or completely exclude it, and in either way you would produce the inequality which the Constitution prohibits.

If the Congress of the United States can prohibit, they can facilitate. As Sitka is a port of the United States, I apprehend the same regulations as to commerce, that is to say as to revenues, must exist there in order to procure that uniformity in the laying of taxes, excises, and impost duties that is plainly demanded and required by the letter of the Constitution.

I understand that by a clause under one of the sections of the revised code a vessel is liable to forfeiture. Will the Senator from Florida give me the number of that section?

Mr. CALL. Section 1955 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the wrongful importation of distilled spirits into Alaska.

Mr. BAYARD. Section 1954 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

The laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation are extended to and over all the mainland, islands, and waters of the territory ceded to the United States by the Emperor of Russia by treaty concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, A. D. 1867, so far as the same may be applicable thereto.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator from Delaware has the statute before him, if he will refer to the very next section after the one he has read he will find that the existing state of the law is precisely what it is made by this section of the bill, except that instead of conferring upon the President power to prohibit the importation Congress does it itself.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that the question has been raised. I can see that you do create hereby a discrimination between ports not in different States but ports of the United States, and the moment you do that you destroy that uniformity of excise and of imposts that I think the Constitution requires.

I do not know that this has been the subject of criticism or debate before, and my desire simply is to prevent the matter from giving rise to litigation or difficulty on the part of citizens of the United States. I am disposed to believe that if a vessel arriving at Sitka should have a cargo, an invoice of brandy from a foreign country in the way of spirituous liquors, it would be dutiable according to the same rate that it is elsewhere, and as long as it was kept in the condition of importation it would be lawful to have it there; and yet it would be in conflict with the letter of this proposed statute.

It is for the purpose simply of preserving due and constant regard for the limitations of the Constitution that I was disposed to give my assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida that you do by this section of the bill invade the principle of absolute equality and unity which must exist in the commerce of the United States, for there is but one commerce, and the laws affecting that commerce must be uniform all over the United States. Different rates of duties can not be imposed, nor can preferences be given to one port over another, nor can you prohibit importation at one port and allow it at another.

If this be so, then I submit this question may arise, probably will arise, and I think there ought to be legislation that would prevent embarrassment to any citizen of the United States who follows one law and yet may find himself in conflict with another. I do not think it ought to be subject to the discretion of the officers of revenue at the different ports of the country. There ought to be one law for all.

Mr. GARLAND. I was of the opinion yesterday that if there was a question connected with this bill that was plain it was this. Section 1955 of the Revised Statutes, referring to the President, gives him power "to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of firearms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into and within the Territory of Alaska." The bill changes that so far as to prohibit it absolutely "except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes," and then declares that the President "shall make such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

Senators seem to misunderstand all the time the purpose of this bill. This bill intends simply to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Alaska. It is not a general revenue bill; it is not a tariff bill; nor is it a bill making the Territory of Alaska a State. Being a bill of that sort, it comes within the power of Congress under that clause of the Constitution which says Congress shall have authority to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the territory and other property of the United States, and it does not conflict with any other clause.

It was long since determined, as far back as 14 Peters, in the celebrated Gratiot case, that the "other property" mentioned in that clause of the Constitution was simply the land of the United States. Now Congress is dealing with other matters, and attempts, so far as this bill speaks, to say that these limitations shall exist in reference to arms, ammunition, and spirits. The section of the statutes virtually like this bill has stood for sixteen years, since 1868. Substantially this section of the bill has been in the Revised Statutes as section 1955 since that time.

The question is not a new one; it is not a new one in itself; it is not a new one as applicable to this particular Territory, because the very point has been adjudicated by Judge Deady, and the distinguished lawyers who raised it did not think enough of it to bring it to the Supreme Court. The Louisa Simpson was seized and her cargo forfeited for a violation of section 4 of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Statutes at Large, 241). Among other things the counsel for the claimant said: "The executive order of February 4, 1870, is void, because Congress cannot confer power on the President to make such a regulation."

There was the question raised by the distinguished counsel, Mr. Strong. The Senator from Oregon who sits farthest from me [Mr. DOLPH] opposed him in that.

No authority was cited—

Says the judge—

in support of this extraordinary proposition, and the argument in support of it was little else than the assertion of counsel to that effect. I see no reason to doubt the power of Congress to authorize the President to make this regulation prohibiting the importation of pure spirits into the district of Alaska under such penalties as Congress may have prescribed. In fact, it is simply authorizing the President to determine and declare when and how far section 4 of the act of July 27, 1868, should go into effect. It is believed that an examination of the legislation of Congress will disclose many instances of like authority and duty imposed on the President, and that the power to do so has never been seriously questioned. (Sawyer's Circuit Court Reports, volume 2, page 71.)

By the act here referred to, which is section 1955 of the Revised Statutes, we allowed the President to impose a prohibition. By this bill we make it ourselves subject to three exceptions, and authorize the President to make the necessary regulation. The case of the Louisa Simpson is a stronger one than section 14 of this bill as now amended, so far as it raises a constitutional question, because now Congress makes the prohibition subject to the exception of three things, and simply leaves the President to prescribe the rules and regulations. The case of the Louisa Simpson, which is directly in point, decides even more than is claimed by section 14, which is under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I have no difficulty in my mind about this question, because I do not think that this provision to which reference has been made comes under the exercise of the commercial power. I think it is the exercise of the police power in a Territory more properly speaking. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Canter vs. The American Insurance Company (1 Peters), speaking of the power of Congress over the Territories, said that the Government of the United States exercised a twofold power, the power of the general and of a local Legislature. We are not exercising the power of general legislation in respect to this matter, but we are exercising a power that appertains to local authority alone.

Now, I do not suppose that anybody would question the power of a State to prohibit the introduction of intoxicating drinks within its borders, notwithstanding the power has been given to Congress to regulate commerce, as stated by my colleague and by the Senator from Delaware. Each State in this Union to-day in the exercise of its police power may exclude from its limits, I think, by the action of its people forming its constitution, and prohibit absolutely, the introduction of such things as might be considered detrimental to the morals of the people. I am not in love with such a provision, I will say candidly; but I am speaking of the power, and I want to keep my own record as straight as I can upon it. I say therefore this is not the exercise of the commercial power, but it is the exercise of the police power with which Congress is undoubtedly possessed with respect to the Territories.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, as I do not wish to say anything more about this bill, I want to say a few words to the Senator from Indiana, who has it in charge. While he might have thought, as he indicated the other day, that I antagonized it from mere capriciousness, I was anxious to understand the real character of this measure, and I can say to him in all candor that, if my amendments have had no other effect, they have had the effect of bringing to light the true character of this bill, which was involved in great doubt and obscurity before.

It will be remembered that at the outset of my argument the other day upon a provision herein the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], a member of the Territorial Committee, stated in the Senate that a certain provision of the Revised Statutes under Title XXIII, relating to Territories, would be in operation in this Territory, and that this Territory would fall within that language of the Revised Statutes which speaks of "Territories hereafter to be organized." I took the ground that it was not intended that this Territory should fall within that category at all, that there was no intention on the part of the Committee on Territories to organize this as a Territory, to give to the people in it any Territorial rights; and the purpose of my amendment really was to test it, and when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] yesterday came forward and expressly incorporated a provision into my amendment excluding Territorial representation from the Territory he indicated the character of this measure, that it is not a Territorial organization, but, as he says, that it is a judicial district.

If this is the character of government intended to be given to the people, and it is the best that can be done, let us have it, but let it not go out to those people that they have a Territorial government like other Territories of the Union, an idea that may lead to very great confusion there, because they are not as well adapted to the consideration of our laws as people who have been longer accustomed to them.

I was very sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] should have thought it necessary to use the very harsh word "absurd" in what he said in regard to my amendment yesterday in reference to the Constitution of the United States being extended to this Territory.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will pardon me, I am very sorry, too. I did not know that I used that word, and I will withdraw it with great pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Because I am sure that in addressing myself to the Senate, while I do not profess to be as well informed upon subjects of this kind as all others, I am not in the habit of giving expression to opinions that can properly be denominated as "very absurd." I said then candidly that in the view which I expressed I was supported by some of the best authority on this continent, and I indicated at the time that I was only putting forth the opinion entertained by no less a man than Mr. Webster. It is true I had not read the debate in which he gave expression to that view for many years, but it was distinctly upon my mind, and I knew that I could not be very far in error when I made the statement that I did. I now read from Benton's Thirty Years' View, page 731, where Mr. Benton says:

Mr. Webster replied with showing that the Constitution was made for States, not Territories—that no part of it went to a Territory unless specifically extended to it by act of Congress—that the Territories from first to last were governed as Congress chose to govern them independently of the Constitution and often contrary to it, as in denying them representatives in Congress, a vote for President and Vice-President, the protection of the Supreme Court—that Congress was constantly doing things in the Territories without constitutional objection (as making mere local roads and bridges) which could not be attempted in a State.

Then he cites Mr. Webster's own language:

The Constitution—

Says Mr. Webster—

as the gentleman contends, extends over the Territories. How does it get there? I am surprised to hear a gentleman so distinguished as a strict constructionist affirming that the Constitution of the United States extends to the Territories, without showing us any clause in the Constitution in any way leading to that result; and to hear the gentleman maintaining that position without showing us any way in which such a result could be inferred increases my surprise.

One idea further upon this branch of the subject. The Constitution of the United States extending over the Territories, and no other law existing there!

Then he goes on to speak of Louisiana:

Will the gentleman say that in any court established in the Territories the judge holds his office in that way? He holds it for a term of years and is removable at executive discretion. How did we govern Louisiana before it was a State? Did the writ of habeas corpus exist in Louisiana during its Territorial existence? Or the right to trial by jury? Who ever heard of trial by jury there before the law creating the Territorial government gave the right to trial by jury? No one. And I do not believe that there is any new light now to be thrown upon the history of the proceedings of this Government in relation to that matter. When new territory has been acquired it has always been subject to the laws of Congress—to such laws as Congress thought proper to pass for its immediate government, for its government during its Territorial existence, during the preparatory state in which it was to remain until it was ready to come into the Union as one of the family of States.

That is not my opinion, but it is the opinion of "the great expounder," as he was called in his day. I did not know much about this Territory when the debate began and I can not say that I know much about it now, but there is one thing of which I feel assured, that it is worthy of all the attention that has been given to it here. I do not agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who is always very correct in what he says about things of this kind, that it is a valueless acquisition. I think that the acquisition of the Territory was one of the wisest acts of statesmanship that ever was exercised by this Government. I think that its value is very great, almost immeasurable. Up to this time we have little or no knowledge of its resources beyond the fur trade. We have had it here from high authority that that trade itself was highly remunerative; but there are resources in that Territory which have not been touched, and I was in hopes that a system of government might be inaugurated which would result in bringing into full play the energies of the people with reference to that Territory. Its fisheries alone constitute a mine of wealth that can not well be calculated. Its timber resources, its capacious harbors on the Pacific, where harbors are very scarce—for it may be remembered that from Panama to Puget Sound, with the exception of San Francisco, there is not a safe or commodious harbor until you get up to the country of Alaska—these open up an avenue for traffic to that region of wealth, the East, which has been coveted by all the nations of the earth—Japan and China. It places you nearer that great center of wealth than any other nation in the world of consequence. I think it is understood that the passage from Sitka to China and Japan is nearer than from San Francisco, and I have no doubt that a very large and a very extended commerce will spring up between the ports of this Territory and the great empires of China and Japan. It has coal; it has iron; it has lead; it has gold and silver; it has fish in such innumerable quantities that one German writer says that it is impossible to navigate its streams without meeting with obstructions from the swarms of fish that infest its rivers. This country is valuable beyond description; and in all that I have said with reference to this form of government proposed to be established there I was anxious to promote the interest of the people there and bring forth a full discussion in regard to the character of this Territory.

Mr. President, it has gone out to the people of the United States that it is a country in which a white man can not live unless he consents to become a Laplander. There is a very great misapprehension prevailing in the public mind touching the climate of the Territory. The climate of Sitka is as mild as that of Washington. It is true they have not got quite as much sunshine there as we have here, but the winters are not any colder in Sitka than they are in Washington, and not near as cold as they are in New York. It is far warmer there in winter time than in many of the leading European capitals. Stockholm, St. Petersburg, and all those places are infinitely colder than Sitka and the country around it in this Territory. There is no difficulty there because of the cold, although if you were to make this statement in some parts of this country you would be laughed at and told that it was impossible to live there.

I have here a statement which I desire shall be incorporated into the RECORD, showing the mean temperature of that climate in comparison with others, which was prepared at one time by the Smithsonian Institute at the request of Mr. Sumner. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made without objection.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. HARRISON. I only rise to ask that the vote may be taken upon this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole embodied in section 14.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee of the Whole are now all disposed of. The bill is still open to amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the words "Territory of" in the title be stricken out, so that the title shall read: "A bill providing a civil government for Alaska."

The amendment was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 75, being the bill (S. 22) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment in section 1, line 16, after the word "disability," to insert "of the President or Vice-President;" so as to read:

Then the Secretary of the Interior shall act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed or a President shall be elected.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment is merely verbal. It does not change the sense of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. BOWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3948) making oppropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOWEN presented a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to him, in relation to the audited claim of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad Company for Army transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to accompany the amendment submitted by Mr. BOWEN to House bill 3948.

CALIFORNIA INDIAN WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. MAXEY. Since the morning hour this morning I have received a communication from the Secretary of War respecting a bill in my hands from the Committee on Military Affairs. He suggests the importance of printing the letter of the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department in connection with the bill, and on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I move that the bill (S. 809) to indemnify the State of California for balances paid and remaining due on account of indebtedness incurred in the Indian wars, for the payment of which said State issued bonds in 1851 and 1852, a part of which remain unpaid owing to delays occasioned by War Department rulings under the act of Congress of August 5, 1854, and the documents connected with it be printed, and recommitted to the committee. I want the letter of the Secretary of War and the report of the Third Auditor printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 7 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 25, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Bishop LYMAN, of North Carolina.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that yesterday, when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the bill (H. R. 745) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, the Chair supposed that the bill related only to private claims. Upon an examination, however, of the provisions of the bill it appears that it proposes general legislation, and the Chair thinks that instead of going to the Private Calendar it ought to have been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If there be no objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of a bill. The bill which I introduced yesterday (H. R. 3960) to increase the efficiency of the Signal Service was naturally by its title referred to the Committee on Commerce. But it is a bill providing for promotions in the Army, and should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that change of reference.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair is advised, the Journal shows that the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARLEM RIVER.

Mr. HUTCHINS, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Judge J. R. Angel, N. K. Freeman, and others, citizens of New York, praying that an act of Congress be passed authorizing the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River, New York, for a sum not exceeding $1,295,000, including the furnishing of the right of way free of cost to the United States, the work to be completed in 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

DUTY ON WOOL.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD resolutions of wool-growers of Fairfield County, Ohio, and of the Columbiana County Sheep-Breeders and Wool-Growers' Association, asking a restoration of the duty on wool.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent for the printing of these resolutions in the RECORD?

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Hereafter I hope these memorials will be presented through the petition-box.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, notified the House that it insisted on its amendment, disagreed to by the House, to joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on its part Mr. HALE, Mr. MILLER of California, and Mr. SAULSBURY.

It further announced the passage without amendment of joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Antonio Barrios, of Guatemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. 1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.; in which concurrence was requested.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, has been returned from the Senate with the message that that body insisted on its amendment disagreed to by the House, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HUTCHINS, and Mr. CALKINS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask for the present consideration of the following——

Mr. HORR. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I wish to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read as a substitute for the resolution referred to that committee on motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] on the 19th instant.

The SPEAKER. Is it of a public or a private nature?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It is a resolution of inquiry for information from one of the Departments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will withhold it for the present, as this is private-bill day.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The morning hour was dispensed with (two-thirds agreeing thereto).

Mr. SLOCUM. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday I alluded, in the remarks I made in the Committee of the Whole House, to the evidence tending to show, as I claimed, that the order to move from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station might have been obeyed. I did not enter into the detail of that evidence, but I told where it might be found. In those remarks as reported in the RECORD I find two mistakes to which I wish to call attention, both made through my fault, probably—one surely. I referred to Bristoe Station as being the place where the order to move reached General Porter. I intended to say Warrenton Junction. The name of the witness who testified to hearing the conversation or the statement of Gen. Fitz-John Porter on his arrival at Bristoe Station was reported as W. S. Paxton. I intended to say W. C. Faxon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is left for me only to discuss the facts connected with the transaction of the 29th day of August. But, before I go directly to that, I may be allowed, properly, here to refer to the alleged change of opinion of General Garfield in relation to this matter. It was said in debate in Committee of the Whole that General Garfield was himself the author of this bill. By what strange reasoning that conclusion was arrived at is not for me to say, but he did introduce a bill, or perhaps a resolution, looking to an inquiry in reference to an alleged discovery of important evidence. What his opinion would have been on the evidence that might have been produced does not appear from the proceedings or the resolution; but that resolution was defeated. I stand here to-day, Mr. Chairman, to say that I know what his opinion was up to the 7th day of March, 1881. It then was what mine is now. It then was what it was when he wrote the letter to General Cox.

In this connection I may also refer to the statement made in argument that there was necessarily injustice in the action of the court-martial, because it sat at a time when prejudice was rife. I am not acquainted with many of the gentlemen composing that tribunal, but I think I may say, and be justified by those who know him, that so far as General Garfield was concerned as a member of that court-martial, prejudice had no power to govern his actions. His own prejudice would not swerve him a hair. The prejudice of others would have no control over him.

I need not say, Mr. Chairman, that, in my judgment, it is a matter of little consequence what General Garfield thought at one time or another, so far as our action is concerned. If I had known that General Garfield, sitting on that court-martial once, had changed his opinion on a rehearing at another time, it would not have changed my mind, as much as I respected him and his judgment. It would only have caused me to re-examine the evidence, the only source of information or judgment that can come to this committee. But to gentlemen who only seek to know the opinion of Grant or Garfield or of this board, I have shown sufficient respect to say what I understand to have been the position of General Garfield. But, sir, if he were in this House to-day, or out of this House as a constituent of mine, as once he was, I would be representing his views in the vote I shall give; and if he were here, occupying the place in which I stand, this committee would listen to the reasons which actuated him in his original judgment and those which remained with him until he died.

I now proceed to the discussion of the question connected with the charges before the court-martial and the country against Fitz-John Porter for his action, or want of action, on the 29th day of August, 1862. I may say here I do not like this bill on account of the possible construction which may be given to it.

While it says that nothing in this bill shall be so construed as to give this applicant pay for the time that he has been out of the Army, I still am not certain that the bill does not in effect accomplish that result; because, sir, while it shall not be construed under one of its provisions to give him pay, it does restore him to all the rights which he had on the day of the approval of the sentence of the court-martial, and another law exists under which he can make claim for his compensation, and which claim may be established as a good and a valid one; besides, if this bill becomes a law, his pay surely follows by some means.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not stop here. I would not make any opposition to the bill simply on that account at this time. My reason for expressing opposition to its features and to its intent lies deeper. My objection to the bill is more emphatic than that.

In order to know and judge clearly with regard to the question involved in this debate and act upon it with understanding, though in the estimation of some our knowledge appertaining to it may be very little at best, still it will be necessary for us to keep in our own minds certain conditions in regard to the location of the scenes and transactions of that memorable day. If, sir, you stand at Warrenton Junction looking somewhat north of east, you will see a pike extending in that direction, known, I believe, as the Warrenton and Centreville pike or possibly the Warrenton pike. Following that pike in a direction east of north for twenty miles, about, you pass the town of Gainesville and the hamlet of Groveton and arrive at Centreville. The main movements of the forces on both sides were toward the pike which I have named on this memorable 29th of August, 1862. Gainesville lies about midway between Warrenton and Centreville. Groveton, the chief scene of the conflict, lies about midway between Gainesville and Centreville. It is ten miles from Warrenton to Gainesville and ten miles from Gainesville to Centreville, and about four miles to Groveton from Gainesville. Going from Warrenton in a southwestern direction you will follow the Warrenton

Railroad until you reach its junction with the Orange and Alexandria Railroad at Warrenton Junction. From Warrenton Junction, bearing north of east, you pass through Bristoe Station and come to Manassas and Manassas Junction and a little beyond to Bull Run, a line of about fifteen miles. Prolonging that line from Bull Run eastwardly so far as to make this line as long as the first one, a point nearly south of Centreville will be reached, and these lines will form an outline map of the country which embraces the scene of the movements of the two armies on the 27th, 28th, and 29th days of August. From Gainesville northwest (more west than north) lies Thoroughfare Gap, eight or nine miles distant. The Manassas Gap Railroad, running from Manassas Junction, passes through Thoroughfare Gap and northwestwardly from that point.

On the morning of the 29th of August Fitz-John Porter and his forces lay between Bristoe Station and Manassas Junction. Early in the morning, at 3 o'clock as the testimony shows, an order was sent him by General Pope, which reached him about daylight in the morning, to march his force toward Centreville. Later, when new information had reached the commander-in-chief and had changed his view as to the situation of affairs, another order was issued, which reached Porter between 8 and 9 a. m., directing him to move toward Gainesville. Gainesville is north and west of Bristoe Station. His troops were then in marching order, and they were soon turned in the direction indicated. He arrived at about half past 10 at Bethlehem church, a point where the road separates, one branch leading to Gainesville, the other to Sudley Springs; Bethlehem church being about two miles from Manassas Junction. In that neighborhood, the head of his column having reached beyond and toward Dawkin's Branch, which is about two and one-half miles from Bethlehem church, he was overtaken between 12 and 1 o'clock by General McDowell with the order known as the joint order. Under that order he received not only direction as to his movements, but the reasons for that direction. He was to march on the Gainesville road, and it was expected that in the neighborhood of Gainesville Jackson would be found, and that Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno, who had been at Centreville, would meet Porter at that point and form a junction with him. Generals McDowell and Porter discussed this joint order, General McDowell being the ranking officer. They both knew that the scope and meaning of the order was to march upon Gainesville, not as a holiday sport, but for the purpose of throwing their forces into the impending battle. The matter was talked over between them. McDowell said to Porter, "You go in here with your forces, and I will march my troops by the Sudley road and place them on the left of the forces engaged;" and thus he would have filled up the gap between Porter, had he taken his assigned place, and Reynolds, who was upon the left of the Union forces then engaged.

"You go in here with your force." That Porter understood this remark of McDowell to be an order to engage, is evident from a dispatch he sent to McDowell at 6 p. m. of the 29th, in which he says, "Failed in getting Morell to you," and by another of about the same date, directed to McDowell or King, in which he says, "I have been wandering over the woods and failed to get a connection with you," and by a third, written about the same time, perhaps a little later, in which he says:

> The firing on my right has so far retired that I can not advance, and have failed to get over to you, except by the route taken by King, and shall withdraw to Manassas.

It may as well be stated here as further on, that he did not try to get Morell to McDowell, he did not wander over the woods, nor did he try to advance. He did not even know the force of the enemy in his front, nor did he try to develop that force; and he so swears in his testimony in the McDowell court-martial.

McDowell left Porter at that point, and with those instructions, and went up the Sudley Springs road, and his troops afterwards got into the engagement, the division under King notably.

By all accounts—I speak now, Mr. Chairman, of the evidence—by all accounts when McDowell left Porter he no longer did or could undertake to command him. While there, he was his superior officer, and did tell him to "put his troops in there." Porter, in reply, pointing toward a cloud of dust rising above the trees, said: "If we go in here anywhere we will get into a fight." McDowell replied: "That is what we are here for."

McDowell went off on the Sudley road under this same joint order in pursuit of the common enemy, and found him.

But I am premature. It is now said that McDowell at this time said: "Porter, this is no place for a fight; you are too far out already." Bethlehem church too far out! Too far out; in what way? Three miles and more from the enemy, he was too far off! And the position would have been corrected by obedience to McDowell's order: "You go in here." But the testimony as to that remark is mostly from witnesses who testify as to the conversation, first, sixteen years after the words were said to have been spoken. McDowell says he made no such remark. He says he did tell Porter to go in there, and left him.

On that morning Jackson's position was about Groveton; his left extending up toward Sudley Springs, which is nearly north of Groveton, and that part of his army would be at right angles to this turnpike of which I have been speaking; his left wing extended west of Groveton toward Gainesville, but not reaching Gainesville.

Porter about 12 o'clock was told by McDowell to "go in there." It is disputed now whether at this time Longstreet had reached the scene of operations or not. I will not discuss that, Mr. Chairman, for I have not time. I will take as my statement the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], who spoke upon that point. Longstreet came through Thoroughfare Gap that morning at sunrise; so he says. He had eight or nine miles to go to reach Gainesville. When he reached Gainesville he turned to the left on the pike toward Jackson's right, which reached out from Groveton toward Gainesville. Longstreet says that soon after passing the gap they heard the booming of cannon; that his troops were marching rapidly then; but he says "naturally the soldiers accelerated their pace at every discharge of the guns." So I say, Mr. Chairman, soldiers accelerate their pace at every discharge of the enemy's guns. It was in his army as in Napoleon's and in Moltke's, the business to go where the guns were booming, and his soldiers without orders marched rapidly toward that point. He arrived according to his present recollection and deployed his troops by 11 o'clock. In passing, I will say it is impossible that his memory is correct. But admit it. Does this committee care where Longstreet was? For some purposes this is immaterial, for others it is material. Where was Longstreet's force and how much of force had he? Letters regarded more important than evidence, opinions regarded more weighty than testimony on which they are founded, unite in saying that Longstreet had twenty-five thousand troops. Mr. Chairman, he had on that day but twenty thousand troops. Turn to the evidence of Longstreet himself, and he will tell you that Anderson, with a full division, came in that day from Warrenton and only reached him that night, and that that division was five thousand strong, and that he included that force in his estimate of twenty-five thousand for his command. Then, with his twenty thousand, where was he? Wilcox's brigade of six thousand men was in advance; and it was deployed upon the immediate right of Jackson, with three or four hundred yards of intervening space occupied by artillery.

Hood and Evans were deployed next to Wilcox, and only Jones, with one brigade, was in position, even after Longstreet was fully deployed where he could be opposed to the point where Porter ought to have been under this order; and Jones only had under his command six thousand men, and a small command of cavalry passing hither and thither, now and then drawing brush in the road to raise a dust to make Porter, or whoever was there, think a force was present. D. R. Jones's division of Longstreet's corps alone occupied the extreme right of the confederate army on that day.

At 2 o'clock Lee heard that there was a force approaching on his right—he says threatening his right—and by his order Longstreet removed Wilcox's force and changed it over to the support of Jones. Then there were twelve thousand men who remained there until, as Longstreet says, the force which had threatened him retired, when he, at 4 o'clock, and before the main infantry fight, ordered Wilcox back again to the assistance of Jackson, and Wilcox remained with Jackson's force until midnight. Hood and Evans were engaged there all day whenever there was an engagement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see I can not proceed at this rate and get through with what I desire to say, and I must get hastily along. Porter did not advance. He never deployed his corps, except two regiments as skirmishers and two more as supports, during that long day; but, on the contrary, they remained in the road and by its side with stacked arms, the head of the column near Dawkin's Branch, within less than a mile of the enemy, and the rear at Bethlehem church, three miles away; and all day long he staid there, he personally being at Bethlehem church, and only twice—once about 1 and once later—going toward Dawkin's Branch. At 4.30 another order was sent to him by Pope. That order was to attack the enemy on his right flank in the direction of which his line of march was taking him. The bearer of this order found Porter under a tree near Bethlehem church, lying on the ground as he (Capt. Douglas Pope) says, at 5 o'clock. Charles Duffee says he was with Pope when the order was delivered, which he says was as early as 5.30. Others say it was later; but whenever it was, he was found there under that tree, and as Pope was recalled to Porter after he had left him and was detained an hour and a half, it was doubtless this later visit that the witnesses, who speak of seeing him at about sundown, refer to. His troops had stacked arms and were resting. At that moment the cheers of the Union troops and the yells of the confederate soldiers engaged in desperate and doubtful battle sounded in his ears; but he never raised himself from his recumbent position, showed not the least interest in the matter, and gave no orders except one that was immediately countermanded.

Now, to make the matter as brief as I can, I say that if he had no order, it was the duty of Fitz-John Porter to advance where his comrades were engaged. All along that line there were Heintzelman and Reno and Sigel and Reynolds desperately fighting and sorely needing aid. Yet the left wing, under Porter, within sound of that cannonading and that fighting all the day, advanced not. The Union loss on that day in killed and wounded was between six and eight thousand men, and the sound of cannonading and musketry firing was in the ears of that force. I aver that Porter's duty, without orders or with orders, was to advance. If Longstreet's corps opposed him, then it could not fight in two places. It could not fight against Pope and at the same time fight against Porter. It did fight against Pope alone while ten thousand to twelve thousand of the best and freshest troops of the Army, within striking distance, were spectators of the fray.

Now for the animus of this non-action on the part of Porter. I refer you to the dispatches of the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August sent by Porter to Burnside. I can not stop to read them now, but will ask permission to print them, and also the orders to which I have alluded, in my remarks. I must hurry on.

One thing more. Mr. Ormsby testifies that during the court-martial he was present with another gentleman and heard Fitz-John Porter say, referring to the orders and to the testimony given before the court-martial that day and the day before, "I was not loyal to Pope; I was loyal to McClellan." And on the same day a gentleman whom I now see before me, an officer of this House, William Blair Lord, testifies that he heard in the same conversation Fitz-John Porter say, "I was not loyal to Pope; I can not deny that." That is in the evidence, and not a living being denies that those statements are true.

Mr. LAIRD. Where is that evidence?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It was given before the board of review.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman cite it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I could do so in a few minutes, but I have no time to be more particular now. Nobody denies it. I will give you the papers when I close my remarks.

Now, what is that confession? It is a plea of guilty. Not to be loyal to Pope was to be disloyal to the flag, was to be disloyal to the Union; and gentlemen who vote to reinstate him, or to pension him, vote so knowing that by his own confession he was disloyal to his commander-in-chief, undisputedly disloyal, admittedly disloyal. Mr. Porter has been tried and convicted. He has been pardoned, so far as the President's pardon can go. But this House ought not to restore him to the rights he once had, those rights which he himself forfeited.

This Congress can not restore him to the position that he once held. No boards of advice, no congress in the world, can make those laurels green and live again that died upon his brow as he lay under that tree refusing to obey the order of his commander-in-chief and admitting his disloyalty to that commander.

We may remove his disabilities, if they have not already been removed, but it is a case of suicide; and we can not revive the glory that once clustered around his brow, and that might again be there except by his own confessed acts of disloyalty.

It is said that an advance would have been unfortunate if he had gone forward. In civil life the unexpected occurs, and the more so in military affairs. Tell me if it is not true that if in regard to everything important that was done or attempted during the whole history of the war you could not find some man who beforehand said it could not be done in a case that was successful, or who beforehand said it could be done in those cases that turned out not to be successful.

Longstreet swears that he would have beaten Porter had he advanced. The confederates were in the habit of thinking that they could defeat us on every occasion. Porter was a good general, with the best troops in the service under his command, ten or twelve thousand strong. Their vigorous assault would have been felt; in the even-balanced contest might have been successful.

Suppose that General Hooker had refused to make the advance on Lookout Mountain, and had been court-martialed for that disobedience. How many able generals would have said that he was justified in refusing because he never could have scaled those heights! And Bragg would have given testimony here that he could have crushed him had he attempted it. Yet Hooker made the attempt and succeeded.

Suppose Farragut's subordinates, ordered to pass Fort Jackson and Fort Saint Philip, had declined to go. How many able officers of the Navy would have testified that it could not have been done! And General Duncan would have sworn that if Farragut had attempted it with his wooden hulks he would have blown him out of water.

Now, as I understand it, not being a soldier, but using my reason, when an order is given to a subordinate officer it is the business of that officer to try to obey it, and let the responsibility be elsewhere. Porter neglected every one of these orders, tried to obey none, refused every one of them, sneered at his commander, and confessed that he did not intend to obey his orders; but his duty remained the same, and his disobedience was his crime. How would Grant or Sherman, in Pope's place, have accepted his excuses? Imagine Grant in command and Sherman, Thomas, Sheridan, or Logan in Porter's place, and all things else as they were on that day, would they have remained idle, waiting for night, that they might bivouac at Bethlehem church as Porter did? Impossible. Nay, put McClellan where Pope was and what would Porter have done? The same flag, the same sacred cause were in the keeping of Pope, the same duty on Porter, as though another commander led. Again, suppose Lee had ordered Jackson to be at Bristoe by daylight on the morning of the 28th "on all accounts," he (Jackson) being at Warrenton Junction, would he have waited till daylight before he started, and given for his excuse a dark night, a sprinkle, and wagons in the road, or on the 29th would he have lain within hearing of the fighting "yell" of his comrades in arms and given no aid, received his commander's orders to engage without rising from the ground or moving to obey because the order came late? All these officers would have done their duty, and what they would have done Porter ought to have done.

Restore him if you please, but do not understand that in doing so you are giving to us the olive branch of peace. Do not vote to restore him with the understanding that you are allaying irritation. You are creating it in a way of which you have no present idea. I have tried to make no allusion that would be offensive, and I make none now in an offensive sense. I put a case not as a parallel but only as an illustration of the feelings of our soldiers in this case. If the British Government had had the power after the war of the Revolution to force Benedict Arnold back into our Army it would not have pleased the American soldiers who had fought that war.

Mr. Chairman, does the Old Flag need the support of a man who stops upon the field of battle in sight and hearing of the enemy because he dislikes his commander? Would the stars of that flag be any brighter by reason of the restoration of such a man? Would our Government be any more stable or strong with such a man's hand on its standard?

Mr. Chairman, as Washington once said, "Put none but Americans on guard to-night," so I say let no man but a loyal, true soldier take hold of that flag which is the admiration of so many of us, and which floats to-day over all the States of this Union. Let no man but a true man, let no man who thought more of one commander than he did of his country, who disliked another more than he loved his country, and therefore stood palsied in the presence of the enemy, be recognized as a loyal soldier. I wonder if Fitz-John Porter hears the booming of those cannon to-day? I wonder if he hears the shout of victory that came to his ears on that fearful day? I wonder if his eye goes over that battlefield, and he thinks he sees some victims there that his own right hand might have rescued? I know not what he thinks, but all those things are in my vision and hearing, Mr. Chairman; and with them in my vision, with my understanding of this testimony, and asking no man to form an opinion for me, I have reached the conviction that my protection as an American citizen is not best secured with the Army in the control of or under the influence of such men as I think Fitz-John Porter to be. [Applause.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

Major-General F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction:

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send him word to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately upon his doing so. If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and a section of artillery with it.

By command of General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearny and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn. Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals McDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable.

If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be, for the present, with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, August 29—4.30 p. m.

MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and if possible on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

WARRENTON, 27—p. m.

To General BURNSIDE:

Morell left his medicine, ammunition, and baggage at Kelly's Ford. Can you have it hauled to Fredericksburg and stored? His wagons were all sent to you for grain and ammunition. I have sent back to you every man of the First and Sixth New York Cavalry except what has been sent to Gainesville. I will get them to you after a while. Everything here is at sixes and sevens, and I find I am to take care of myself in every respect. Our line of communication has taken care of itself, in compliance with orders. The army has not three days' provision. The enemy captured all Pope's and other clothing; and from McDowell the same, including liquors. No guards accompanying the trains, and small ones guard bridges. The wagons are rolling on, and I shall be here to-morrow. Good night!

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

The statement as to the captures is wholly false.

WARRENTON JUNCTION, August 27, 1862—4 p. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

I send you the last order from General Pope, which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along rapidly to the rear as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though I think this order may cause it. McDowell moves on Gainesville, where Sigel now is. The latter got to Buckland Bridge in time to put out the fire and kick the enemy, who is pursuing his route unmolested to Shenandoah or Loudoun County. The forces are Longstreet's, A. P. Hill's, Jackson's, Whiting's, Ewell's, and Anderson's (late Huger's) divisions. Longstreet is said by a deserter to be very strong. They have much artillery and long wagon trains.

The raid on the railroad was near Cedar Run, and made by a regiment of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and a section of artillery. The place was guarded by nearly three regiments of infantry and some cavalry. They routed the guard, captured a train and many men, destroyed the bridge, and retired leisurely down the road toward Manassas. It can be easily repaired. No troops are coming up, except new troops, that I can hear of. Sturgis is here with two regiments. Four were cut off by the raid. The positions of the troops are given in the order. No enemy in our original front. A letter of General Lee, seized when Stuart's assistant adjutant-general was taken, directs Stuart to leave a squadron only to watch in front of Hanover Junction, &c. Everything has moved up north. I find a vast difference between these troops and ours. But I suppose they were new, as they to-day burnt their clothes, &c., when there was no the least cause.

I hear that they are much disorganized, and needed some good troops to give them heart, and, I think, head. We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and, I presume, will be there in a few days, if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and tactics in the inverse proportion. I would like some of my ambulances. I would like, also, to be ordered to return to Fredericksburg and to push toward Hanover, or, with a large force, to strike at Orange Court-House. I wish Sumner was at Washington, and up near the Monocacy with good batteries. I do not doubt the enemy have large amounts of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for this Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it, with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions.

I was informed to-day by the best authority that, in opposition to General Pope's views, this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac, an army that could take the best care of itself. Pope says he long since wanted to go behind the Occoquan. I am in great need of ambulances, and the officers need medicines, which, for want of transportation, were left behind. I hear many of the sick of my corps are in houses on the road, very sick. I think there is no fear of the enemy crossing the Rappahannock. The cavalry are all in the advance of the rebel army. At Kelly's and Barnett's fords much property was left, in consequence of the wagons going down for grain, &c. If you can push up the grain to-night please do so, direct to this place. There is no grain here to-day, or anywhere, and this army is wretchedly supplied in that line. Pope says he never could get enough. Most of this is private.

F. J. PORTER.

But if you can get me away, please do so. Make what use of this you choose, so it does good.

F. J. P.

BRISTOE, August 28, 1862—9.30 a. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

My command will soon be up, and will at once go into position. Hooker drove Ewell some three miles, and Pope says McDowell intercepted Longstreet, so that without a long detour he can not join Ewell, Jackson, and A. P. Hill, who are, or supposed to be, at Manassas. Ewell's train, he says, took the road to Gainesville, where McDowell is coming from. We shall be to-day as follows: On the right of railroad, Heintzelman on left, then Reno, then McDowell. He hops to get Ewell, and push to Manassas to-day.

I hope all goes well near Washington. I think there need be no cause of fear for us. I feel as if on my own way now, and thus far have kept my command and trains well up. More supplies than I supposed on hand have been brought, but none to spare, and we must make connection soon. I hope for the best, and my lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and hope Mc's is up also. You will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria.

Ever yours,

F. J. P.

BRISTOE, 29*th*—6 a. m.

General BURNSIDE:

Shall be off in half an hour. The messenger who brought this says the enemy had ben at Centreville, and pickets were found there last night. Sigel had a severe fight last night, &c.

Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the enemy and where Sigel was fighting—within eight miles of him and in sight.

The enormous trains are still rolling on. Many arrivals, not having been watched for fifty hours. I shall be out of provision to-morrow night. Your train of forty wagons cannot be found. But I expect they know what they are doing, which is more than any one here or anywhere knows.

F. J. P.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been discussed from various standpoints. One position taken by its opponents is that Congress can not undo the work that was done by the court-martial; that the court-martial was a tribunal having jurisdiction over this cause; and that its decision of the cause is final; binding upon the country, binding upon Congress. Without entering into a discussion of that proposition at length I plant myself simply upon the principle that Congress can undo anything it has done, unless the undoing of it shall violate some prohibition of the Constitution. For instance, if Congress enacts a law and contracts are made under or by reason of that law, Congress can not revoke the law so far as it applies to those contracts, because there is a prohibition in the Constitution against any legislation impairing the obligation of contracts. But Congress may make a law defining a crime, and may the next day repeal that law. The repeal of the law obliterates the crime; it stops the punishment imposed under the law. In the case of Fitz-John Porter this bill, if it becomes a law, will relieve him from the conviction and sentence of the court-martial, and restore him to the position he would now hold if he had not been convicted, sentenced, and cashiered.

There is another aspect of this case which has become more or less prominent, and that is its political aspect. No man can make this a political question for me. I do not propose to be bound by political considerations in making my decision upon this bill. I care not what the politics or the religion or the color or the riches or the poverty of this man may be, the question with me is, is it our duty to restore him because an injustice was done him?

Another aspect of this case is the effort that has been and is being made to place the friends of this bill in the position of attacking the court-martial and General Grant and others. I have no unkind thought or word for any member of that court-martial or for General Grant or for the gentlemen of the West Point board. I believe that the court-martial, under the pressure of the necessities of that time, under the public influences that permeated the whole atmosphere, under the passions and excitements incident to a state of war, under the disasters that had befallen the Union Army, especially the great disaster of Fredericksburg, which occurred while the court-martial was sitting; under the charge, which was spread broadcast, that there was insubordination on the part of prominent officers of the Army which was leading to defeat—under all these circumstances I believe the court-martial felt impelled conscientiously to find this man guilty, and so convicted him of these charges under the law of military necessity as the members of that court-martial then understood the situation. In other words, I believe that if that identical court-martial had tried this case in a time of peace and after the passions of the war had subsided it would not have convicted him on the evidence produced before it.

I have the very highest respect for the members of that court-martial. They were Union soldiers who did their duty to their country, and no man can make me antagonize men of that sort on any occasion or in behalf of any measure. They deserve the homage, love, and respect of their countrymen, and no word or thought of mine shall ever tarnish their fair fame or dim the luster of their noble achievements.

The first charge against Fitz-John Porter is that he violated an order to march at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 28th of August from Warrenton Junction and arrive at Bristoe Station at daylight. By the arguments of gentlemen Fitz-John Porter is placed in a Procrustean bed, from which it would be difficult to extricate him, if the arguments be sound. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] have argued that it was the duty of Porter to start at 1 o'clock, whatever his success might have been. My friend General BROWNE, of Indiana, has argued that the essence of that order was that he should have arrived at Bristoe Station at daylight. There is one plain difference of opinion between gentlemen in construing that order. In my opinion neither one of these constructions is the correct one. In my judgment Fitz-John Porter, as the commander of a corps separated by nine or ten miles from his commander-in-chief, had the right, and it was his duty, to exercise a wise discretion in reference to the circumstances and conditions of the situation.

Now, what was the condition of things that night of the 27th of August? The best reply to that inquiry is the testimony of the witnesses who were there on the ground. I ask a careful and candid consideration of that testimony. I ask that because I hope this cause will be judged in the light of the evidence, and not according to sentiment, however elevated; and I trust that passion and prejudice will have no influence in determining the fate of this bill.

Now, hear what the witnesses say about the situation of Porter and his corps, and what was said and done. Of these witnesses Generals Griffin, Morell, Butterfield, and Sykes, Colonel Locke, Captains Monteith and Martin, and Lieutenant Weld were with Porter's corps at Warrenton Junction. General Myers had charge of one of the wagon-trains—there was evidently more than one from General Myers's evidence—and Colonel Clary and Captain Fifield the railroad trains. Seven of the witnesses passed over the road beside the railroad that night.

The other witnesses were not immediately on the ground or over the road that night, but were only a few miles away, and most of them knew the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe.

Now, listen to what these witnesses say. Nearly all this testimony, I should have said, was given before the court-martial.

General Griffin says:

Question. What was the condition of the troops under your command on the evening of the 27th with respect to fatigue?

Answer. They were much broken down. I mean by that that they were very weary. We had a great many stragglers that day.

Q. State what was the character of the night between the 27th and 28th of August.

A. The night of the 27th and the morning of the 28th was very dark. It rained a little about 10 o'clock that night, I should think; very little, just sprinkled.

Lieutenant Weld says:

Question. What kind of a night was the 27th of August last?

Answer. It was very dark, indeed. I went to bed about 10 o'clock, and then the night was very dark. I heard some one, I think it was General Morell, who came into camp before I went to bed, saying he had been trying to find General Sykes's headquarters and had lost his way. General Sykes's headquarters were very near ours. In the morning about 3 o'clock I got up and it was drizzling.

General Sykes testifies:

Question. State the character of the night and any reports made to you by your aids as to the difficulties in starting before daylight, if any such were made.

Answer. The night was unusually dark. Before I directed the advance to be sounded I sent an aid-de-camp to find the road so as to lead the column upon it. He returned in a short time and told me the darkness was so great that he could not distinguish the road. He also told me that he was assisted in the search by several soldiers.

Q. State what you recollect of any difficulties which you met with in the road which impeded your march that morning and what steps were taken to remove such difficulties, if any existed.

A. As I anticipated, we ran upon this train of wagons within two miles of my camp. They encumbered the road for miles. Myself and staff officers were constantly engaged in opening the way for the head of my column. On several occasions I had to take my mounted escort and place them on the road with drawn sabers to prevent wagons from closing up in intervals that occurred. I do not think that in my military life I ever had such trouble as I had that day. The wagon-masters and teamsters were alike insubordinate.

Again, he says, in giving reasons for suggesting the delay in the march:

They were, first, that a night march is always fatiguing and injurious to troops; that my command had already marched from twelve to fourteen miles that day; that I thought the darkness would cause confusion; that the constant stream of wagons had passed ahead of us from the time my command reached Warrenton Junction until dusk. And above all, I thought that as but two hours or three hours at most would elapse between 1 o'clock and daylight, we could make the march in much better order and march more rapidly by starting at dawn than by starting at the hour prescribed.

General Morell says:

Question. State what occurred at the time of the receipt of the order, or immediately afterward, between the accused and yourself and the other generals?

Answer. General Porter said to us that he had received this order to march at 1 o'clock that night. We immediately spoke of the condition of our troops—they being very much fatigued—and the darkness of the night, and said that we didn't believe we could make any better progress by attempting to start at that hour than if we waited until daylight. After some little conversation General Porter said: "Well, we'll start at 3 o'clock; get ready." I immediately left his tent and went back to my division and made my preparations for moving.

Q. Did not the generals then present, yourself included, express in strong terms the difficulty of moving as early as 1 o'clock or earlier than 3 o'clock?

A. Yes; on account of the difficulty of marching at night. It was a very dark night; it was cloudy, trying to rain, and did rain before morning.

General Reynolds says, in reference to the night of the 27th:

Question. What was the character of the night?

Answer. It was a very dark night, as was the succeeding night. I recollect both of them distinctly for having been about a good deal after 12 o'clock on each night.

Q. Did you consider it too dark a night to march troops over an unfamiliar country?

A. I should think so, certainly, without a guide or marching on roads. I don't think it possible to march troops in such a night without having a good guide or marching on a road.

Q. If the road over which you were to pass were to some considerable extent obstructed in several places, would you have regarded the march of large masses of troops on that night as practicable?

A. I should not. I should have considered it as a very precarious undertaking.

General Heintzelman says of that night:

Question. Do you remember now what the character of the night was? Was it light, or dark and rainy?

Answer. It was very dark. In the course of the night we had a drizzling rain. Our tents were not pitched; we laid out in the rain. We had difficulty in getting our wagons up.

General Roberts, Porter's accuser, says of that night:

It was cloudy at times so as to be quite dark, and threatened about 2 o'clock to rain, so that I got up from where I was sleeping on the ground, found my wagon and got into it, believing it would rain.

General Butterfield says:

The order, I believe, was for General Porter to move his forces at 1 o'clock in the morning to Bristoe Station. He handed the order to General Morell or to General Sykes, who were present, and said there was a chance for a short nap, or something of that sort, I don't remember the exact words, indicating that there was but little time for preparation. General Sykes or General Morell, I don't remember which (one or both of them), spoke with regard to the fatigue our troops had endured, the darkness of the night, and the fact that in their judgment the troops would be of more service to start at a later hour than they would be to start at the hour named. In reply to these remarks General Porter spoke rather decidedly that there was the order; that it must be obeyed; that those who gave the order knew whether the necessities of the case would warrant the exertions that had to be made to comply with it. I do not state that as the exact words, but as the substance of what he said. Captain De Kay, who brought the order, was then present and was asked some questions about the road. He stated that it was very dark, and that the road was full of teams. General Sykes, I think, suggested that it would be impossible for us to move at the hour named, or if the road was full of teams that they couldn't find the way. General Porter called two aids and sent them off to investigate the condition of the road, or ask General Pope to have the road cleared so that we could come up. When we got outside the darkness was so apparent (to use such an expression) and it seemed to be such a matter of impossibility to move, that General Porter said: "In consideration of all the circumstances I will fix the hour at 3 o'clock instead of 1; you will be ready to move promptly;" and I subsequently wrote an order in General Porter's tent for my command to be in line to march at 3 o'clock.

Colonel Clary says, in reply to a question as to whether he had passed over the road that night:

I think there were ten or twelve persons composing the party. We didn't pass over the whole journey that night; I lost the road and laid by for about 2 hours until daylight.

Q. How did you travel?

A. On horseback.

Q. What was the character of the night?

A. It was dark and cloudy.

Colonel Clary also says:

I was at Warrenton Junction on the 27th of August last. At 10 o'clock that night I received a note from General Porter to move the trains east on the railroad beyond and east of Cedar Run toward Bristoe Station. I gave the orders to the proper persons connected with the trains and they commenced immediately to move. * * * The removal of the trains occupied me from 10 o'clock until about 2 o'clock in the morning, at which time, or perhaps a little later, I myself left that point for Bristoe Station.

Colonel Locke testifies:

The order was received very nearly 10 o'clock in the evening. I was present that evening when a report was made to the accused of the condition of the road.

Q. Do you remember what the report was? If so, state it.

A. The report was that the road was very much blocked and that there were several bad places in the road.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did the corps march at 3 o'clock a. m. on the 28th of August?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What difficulties, if any, did they encounter, and what was the cause of those difficulties?

A. One great difficulty was the darkness of the night. The next was the nearly impassable condition of the roads by reason of wagon-trains.

Q. Was the night very dark?

A. Extremely dark.

Captain Fifield, who was instructed by Colonel Clary to clear the railroad of trains, says:

Question. Where did you go after leaving the trains?

Answer. I attempted to go to Bristoe Station, but didn't reach there until after daylight in the morning, having lost my way, in connection with the party I was with.

Q. How did you travel?

A. On horseback.

Q. Were there any wagons on the country road?

A. There were.

Q. What distance were the wagons stretched along the road, if they were stretched?

A. I should think from between three and four miles from where we first struck the wagons until we got past the main body of the wagons—they were scattered farther along.

* * * * * * *

Q. What was the character of the night; was it light or dark?

A. The early part of the night was a bright starry night of summer without any moon, but about half past 11 o'clock it commenced overcasting and threatened rain. Very black clouds came up, and it did sprinkle a little. It was very dark from that time until toward morning.

Captain Monteith, who, with Captain McQuade, had been sent by General Porter to look out the road to Greenwich, says:

Question. What sort of a night was it?

Answer. Very dark. We had trouble in getting back, but a part of the way we didn't come back the same road that we took going out. * * * We found wagon-trains on the road from Warrenton Junction going by Catlett's Station. We also found wagon-trains coming in on the Warrenton road intersecting the road that runs by the railroad just below Catlett's Station.

Q. In what condition did you find the wagons when you were returning to General Porter?

A. Some of them were stopped and some of them were moving along. * * * The next morning, the 28th of August, when the march was taken up down the railroad, General Porter sent Lieutenant Weld and myself forward to use our efforts in making the way for the infantry. The road was blocked up with wagons as far as we could see.

Q. What efforts were actually made, and how long were you in removing the wagons, if you removed them at all?

A. When we first came to the wagons, the woods on both sides of the road were so thick, and the road was so narrow, that it was impossible to turn the wagons out of the road, and we continued on until we came to a place where the wagons could be doubled or turned out of the road. We were also assisted by some cavalry sent with us. * * * After, General Porter sent us with some cavalrymen; he also sent Colonel Locke with either a company or squadron of cavalry to labor in the same way.

Captain Drake De Kay, who bore the order to Porter, says:

Question. What was the character of the night of the 27th of August?

Answer. To the best of my recollection it was a cloudy night, but not rainy.

* * * * * * *

Q. Had General Porter's command marched at 1 o'clock in the morning would he, or would he not, have passed those wagons in camp?

A. He would have passed them in camp, probably.

Captain Martin says:

We moved at between 3 and 4 o'clock across the run, less than a mile from camp, and halted there, and remained there until daylight. * * * We encountered a difficulty in getting out of camp in the darkness, and got many of our carriages stuck in the run near the edge of the camp; some of them were not got out until near daylight; especially one battery wagon.

Colonel Brinton, who went that night to find General Porter about 12 o'clock, testifies:

Question. What was the character of the night?

Answer. The night was very dark and overcast.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did the darkness materially impede you in your efforts to find your way to General Porter?
A. It did.
Q. And delayed you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see any wagons on the road over which you traveled?
A. Yes; the road from Catlett's Station for half a mile westward was blocked up with wagons. We ran into them constantly. The road is there a narrow one leading through a wood, and it was difficult for us to get along on that account. We ran into a tree on the one hand or a wagon on the other without being able to distinguish until we were upon it.

* * * * * * *

Q. When you reached General Porter did you speak to him of the condition in which you had found the road?
A. Yes, sir, I did; and in answer to his inquiry concerning the state of the road.

Generals Warren, Buchanan, McKeever, Ruggles, Patrick, and Mindil, Colonels Thompson, Marston, and Smith, Majors Hyland and Earle, Lieutenants Randol, Baker, and Davis testified before the West Point board to substantially the same facts.

General Patrick said:

My orderlies and one if not two members of the staff dismounted at different times to feel of the road. It was one of the darkest nights, that night of the 25th. [This is evidently a misprint; it refers to the 27th, as will clearly appear from his evidence on page 183, second part, executive document 37, Forty-sixth Congress.] When I came in with McDowell I got lost on account of the darkness. It was a very dark night, so much so that we stretched men across the road quite a distance each side lest they should pass by the bivouac, as it was so dark that the opening at the side of the road where the men were could not be seen.

Colonel Marston says:

Question. Do you recollect the character of the night of the 27th of August, 1862?
Answer. Part of it I do. It was dark, I should say, until 12 o'clock. After that I don't know how it was. From 9 to 10 o'clock, along there, it was misty and raining a little—fine rain or heavy mist and quite dark. I was out with the officer of the picket line and lost my way, and it was so dark we could hardly find the way.

General Warren said before the West Point board that the wagons—referring to the wagons on the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe that night—were pell-mell, parked like the ice that jams on the shore. A contemporaneous corroboration will be found in Porter's dispatch to Burnside from Warrenton Junction on the evening of the 27th. In that dispatch he says: "Wagons are rolling along the road as if a mighty power were propelling them." Those in the habit of construing evidence will appreciate the force and trustworthiness of that kind of evidence.

Now let me call attention to the testimony of General Myers, whom the Government relied on before the court-martial, and who knew whether wagons blocked the road or not. General Myers, in answer to interrogatories, said:

Question. Do you remember the character of that night—the night of the 27th of August; if so, will you please state it?
Answer. I was up nearly all that night. It was quite dark; there was no moon.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did all wagons go into park or did some continue on the road?
A. I think all my train went into park.

He says:

I think all my train went into park. The wagons were coming in all night, and I could hear the wagons rolling nearly all night. No trains—

Referring to railroad trains—passed me that night.

Question. You have been understood to say that the wagons were rolling all night?
Answer. Yes, going into park as they got along all night; the rear wagons taking a long time to come up in a long train of two thousand or three thousand wagons.
Q. Then they were going into park all night from the road?
A. Yes, wherever they could find a place to park they parked.

Mr. STEELE. Whose evidence is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. BAYNE. The testimony of General Myers.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to read in that connection the latter part of that testimony.

Mr. BAYNE. If I am permitted to have as much time as is necessary to answer the interrogatories of the gentleman or other gentlemen I will yield cheerfully to interruption, otherwise I must decline to yield. Unless time be given me beyond the hour I believe it will be impossible for me to get through if I permit any interruptions, and therefore I cannot yield.

Mr. STEELE. I would say to the gentleman that General Myers himself testifies that he could have moved that night.

Mr. BAYNE. He says in connection with it, however, that he may be mistaken, if the gentleman will examine.

Mr. STEELE. The very last response to a question addressed to General Myers was that he could have moved that night.

Mr. BAYNE. But in that very connection he says, "In that, however, I may be mistaken." That is the very language he uses. Any way, if General Myers said so it was a mere expression of opinion.

Mr. STEELE. But the gentleman has quoted his testimony, and I want to read from a portion of the same testimony.

Mr. BAYNE. I quoted his testimony as to the fact of the wagons being on the road all that night. He recites that as a matter of fact and not as a matter of opinion.

Now, I can not and indeed need not call attention to all that is shown by the testimony of these witnesses. But the salient facts developed are that the night of the 27th of August was dark and cloudy; the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe was blocked with an immense number of wagons; that the road at points at least was narrow; that it was impracticable and dangerous to march troops on the railroad; that the troops were fatigued, some of them having marched seventeen to nineteen miles that day and others twelve to fourteen miles; that by starting at 3 o'clock it was found to be impracticable to march; and that even the daylight march was difficult in consequence of the obstruction, and it required great exertions on the part of General Porter and others to clear the way.

But there is another salient fact developed by that evidence which is more cogent and persuasive than all the others taken together. The evidence shows that when Porter received the order to move at 1 o'clock and be at Bristoe by daylight—a distance of nine or ten miles his corps was required to traverse in about three hours—he at once consulted with Generals Morell, Sykes, and Butterfield, two of these gentlemen being present, the third perhaps coming in afterward. He read the order, and handed it to one of them with the remark, "There is something for a short nap." They then conferred together with reference to the execution of the order, and General Morell, General Sykes, and General Butterfield all testified before the court-martial that they advised General Porter not to move at 1 o'clock that night. They give their reasons for so advising in their testimony.

Now it never has been disputed yet by anybody that General Sykes, General Morell, and General Butterfield were loyal to the core to the Union cause. That fact has never been questioned. If General Butterfield, General Sykes, and General Morell were honest in their judgment, if they expressed to General Porter a conviction of their own as to the impolicy of the movement, why should they be held to be honest and loyal to the cause and Porter dishonest and a traitor? Why were they not tried as accessories before the fact?

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question here.

Mr. BAYNE. I have been compelled to decline interruptions. If I can have time to answer those given to me I shall be very glad, otherwise I cannot yield.

Mr. WELLER. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman have his time extended to enable him to answer all interruptions.

Mr. COSGROVE. I was about to make the same request in behalf of my colleague.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would suggest to the gentleman that he finish his speech first, and answer the interruptions afterward. That is the more orderly way, and his time can be then extended for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman occupy his time for the hour, after which, if necessary, the Chair will entertain a request for an extension.

Mr. BAYNE. It is beyond all dispute, Mr. Chairman, that the officers to whom I have referred so advised Porter on that occasion, and it is a well-known principle with lawyers, it is a reasonable proposition to every mind, that the jury that sits at the time and on the spot and knows all the circumstances is better qualified to judge of such matters than men far away, and who know nothing of the surrounding circumstances except such knowledge as they glean from hearsay or more or less disjointed evidence. There was not, I believe, in that whole Fifth Corps a single man who would have said or who has testified that it would be prudent to march that night. Not a single witness from that corps is produced who says it would have been proper to do so. There were many produced who said it would have been impracticable to move. And now I repeat that this testimony shows, much that I have not cited as well as that which I have, that it would have been impracticable for General Porter to have rendered implicit obedience to that order. The spirit of that order was that he should go to Bristoe Station as early as it was practicable for him to go; and I say by starting at 3 o'clock in the morning he obeyed the spirit of that order, and if he had not done so he would have failed in the intelligent discharge of his duty.

But my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] said in his speech that it was all-important that Porter should have moved to Bristoe at 1 o'clock, because Hooker had had an engagement with the enemy and was out of ammunition; and when he is confronted with this order, which makes no mention of the fact that Hooker was out of ammunition, he says that General Pope would not probably have noted the fact in his order, because the rebels might have captured it and have thus received information which would have been of great danger to the Union cause.

But mark you how plain a tale will put that down. General Pope sent another order to Porter early in the morning of the 28th, in which, and for the first time, he mentioned the fact that Hooker was almost out of ammunition.

If the reason were good that it should not have gone into the order because the rebels might have captured it in the one instance, why was not the reason good in the other instance? But it shows what logic is resorted to by the opponents of this bill to make the worse appear the better side of the case.

The directory part of the order of the 27th is in these words:

The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, * * * so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning.

The reasons given are these:

Hooker has had a severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. * * * We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that and Gainesville, where McDowell is. * * * It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight.

The whole disobedience covers but two hours of time in making a start to pursue a retiring enemy. Compliance with the letter of the order was a physical impossibility. Troops in open day and on a good road can not march three miles an hour. This order required the Fifth Army Corps, consisting of about 9,000 men, to march between nine and ten miles, in the darkness of that night, over that road in three hours.

TWENTY-NINTH OF AUGUST.

The order of the 27th to my mind, however, is by no means the important aspect of this case. In my opinion if the charge of having violated that order had stood alone before the court-martial there would have been no conviction. The gravamen of the charges against General Porter relates to the 29th; and I therefore will go from this first proposition to that one.

Now, what are the circumstances relating to the 29th? Porter was at Bristoe Station. He received an order from General Pope to march his corps to Centreville. Centreville we will say is here [pointing to the left], and in that order there was the allegation that a severe engagement was expected. I will show the improper use that was made of that presently. While he was executing that order another came to him to march toward Gainesville, which is in that direction [pointing to the front]. He, therefore, had to countermarch; and when he had marched toward Gainesville up to Dawkin's Branch, as it is called, he there became aware of the presence of the enemy in his front.

Before I go to the evidence relating to the fact that the enemy was encountered at Dawkin's Branch, I want to say one word about this Centreville order. It has been said by different gentlemen on the floor, notably by my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], that Porter was apprised of the fact that a severe engagement was likely to occur. It is true that when he was ordered to march to Centreville he was notified in the order that a severe engagement was likely to take place. But I leave it to the common sense of anybody and everybody if, when he received the orders I am about to read, he could imagine or believe that an engagement was probable. I will read the order requiring him to countermarch:

CENTREVILLE, August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Shortly after receiving the order I have just read Dr. Abbott brought him what is called the "joint order." Here is the joint order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

You will please move forward with your joint command toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to join the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable.

If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or the next day. My own headquarters will for the present be with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Generals MCDOWELL and PORTER.

Now, is there anything in either of these orders intimating the likelihood of a severe engagement? On the contrary, is not the intimation that Longstreet would not arrive until the evening of the 30th or the morning of the 31st? No prospect of a severe engagement in either of these orders; and yet for some purpose, for what I do not know, the statement in the Centreville order is lugged into the arguments against Porter to show what his anticipation should have been.

That kind of argument results from the weakness of the cause, and should have no place or force in the discussion of this bill.

The gist of this inquiry with reference to Fitz-John Porter on the afternoon of the 29th is, did he know that the enemy was in his front? Was the enemy there, and did he know it? The joint order indicated that the enemy had not come into his front, because the joint order alleged that the enemy would not be there until the evening of the 30th or the morning of the 31st. Now one thing must be assumed as within the knowledge of General Porter, and that is he knew that Longstreet commanded the one wing of the rebel army and that Jackson commanded the other wing. He had been through the Peninsula campaign. He had been acquainted with its history from day to day, and he knew beyond all doubt that Longstreet commanded one wing of that army and Jackson the other. What did Porter say with reference to the prospect on the 28th? Porter on the 28th telegraphed General Burnside:

I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by way of Warrenton by Longstreet, who was cut off.

Is it not evident that Porter then anticipated the coming of Longstreet through Thoroughfare Gap? Did he not apprehend that fact on the 28th? That was the day before the 29th. What then? With this in his mind—and this shows the way he viewed the situation, and it shows moreover that he might not have given full credit to the views of General Pope as expressed in the joint order that the enemy would come on the evening of the 30th or the morning of the 31st—he was riding with General Morell at the head of his division when they came in contact with the enemy. Now, let General Morell state the facts.

General Morell says:

As we countermarched to go there (Gainesville) my division was thrown in front, General Sykes having already passed on toward Centreville. We had gone up the road toward Gainesville perhaps about three miles when I met a mounted man coming toward us. I stopped him and asked him the road to Gainesville, and also the news from the front. He said he had come from Gainesville, and that the enemy's skirmishers were there to the number of four hundred and the main body was not far behind. I then moved on up the road, and in a short time our own skirmishers reported that they had discovered the enemy's skirmishers in their front. The column was then halted by General Porter, who was with me. After a little consultation he directed the batteries to be posted on the crest of the ridge we had just passed and the men to be placed in position.

Why should Porter have directed the batteries to be placed in position on the crest and the men in position if he had not entertained the idea at that time that the enemy was there? That would have been a pure work of supererogation if he had not believed the enemy was there. General Griffin says:

Question. Did you on the 29th make a reconnaissance to the front, or rather cause one to be made, to ascertain the forces of the enemy that opened their artillery upon your troops?

Answer. In fact, no artillery opened that I know of. Before that I had a whole regiment to the front as skirmishers. I took three mounted prisoners, I know.

You will discover the importance of these three mounted prisoners presently.

Q. Do you believe you had in front of you any considerable force of the enemy?

A. Yes; I believe that in the course of the day I had the larger part of Lee's army.

Q. Immediately in front of you, I mean; I don't mean in the remote distance.

A. According to my recollection at the time they formed a line a little obliquely to our front, extending back to Thoroughfare Gap. They were coming from Thoroughfare Gap toward us.

Now, there is the impression derived by General Griffin on that occasion. His belief was that the main body of Lee's army was in their front during that afternoon. Then there was something else. When General McDowell came to General Porter, about 12 or between 12 and 1 o'clock, he showed him a dispatch from General Buford, and what was that dispatch?

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY BRIGADE—9.30 a. m.

Seventeen regiments, one battery, and five hundred cavalry passed through Gainesville three-quarters of an hour ago on the Centreville road. I think this division should join our forces now and engage at once.

JOHN BUFORD,
Brigadier-General.

To General RICKETTS.

Porter was thus advised that the rebels had passed through Gainesville, which was, I think, from two to two and a half miles from where Porter was; had passed there at a quarter before 9 o'clock. General Morell testifies before the West Point board as follows:

Question. What was it that caused the halting of the head of your division where it did halt, in the neighborhood of Dawkin's Branch?

Answer. There we were met by a man coming in from the front, who reported that Longstreet was at Gainesville, and pretty soon after that the skirmishers of my division met Longstreet's and the report came in immediately.

Q. Report to what effect?

A. That they had encountered the enemy's skirmishers.

Q. Where were you personally when the head of your column reached the point where it halted?

A. I was at the head of column. We were marching by the flank. I had just about got to the crest of the descent to the stream called Dawkin's Branch when General Porter immediately ordered us to form line on crest.

Q. How soon after you reached that point yourself that you got information that Longstreet's troops were in your front?

A. Immediately. * * *

Q. Were not three men captured there and sent in by you?

A. There were two or three men there.

Q. Was not that the first intimation you had that the enemy were in your front?

A. That may have been the first intimation. There were two or three men sent in as prisoners. I merely questioned them a few words and sent them to General Porter.

Major Earle testifies as follows, after alleging that the enemy was closing in on the front of Porter:

I also said to the general (Porter) that we were perfectly satisfied that they were Longstreet's men. I knew that fact from the fact that there were some skirmishers captured when we first went in, and General Morell told me that they were Longstreet's men. I was satisfied from the direction they came that they were Longstreet's men coming up from Thoroughfare Gap. General Porter said he was satisfied of that. Then he says, "Get on your horse and take this order back to General Morell;" and he gave me an order.

Which order was to put his troops in position and place them for the expected battle.

Colonel Lake also testified as follows:

Question. Were you present when two or three rebel scouts were brought in in the morning, when you got up to Dawkin's Branch?
Answer. I was.
Q. Did you know or hear at that time whose men they were?
A. I know what one of them said.
Q. What was it?
A. He said they were Longstreet's men.

Lieutenant Weld says:

Question. How soon was this after the head of the column had reached this ridge?
Answer. I don't know. My impression is very strong that they were halted when we got there.
Q. Was it when you were first at the ridge with General Porter that these prisoners were brought in?
A. Yes, it was within a few minutes.
Q. How many prisoners were there?
A. Two, and I think three.
Q. Were they in uniform?
A. As much of a uniform as they ever had—a butternut suit.
Q. Did you know what they were?
A. Yes, confederate soldiers.
Q. What happened when they were brought up to where you and General Porter were?
A. General Porter had a long conversation with them. My impression is that they were sent to the rear. I am not sure about that.

Now, I can not read all this testimony.

Is it not clear from this evidence that Porter when he arrived at Dawkin's Branch knew that the enemy was in his front and that that enemy was Longstreet's wing of the rebel army? Is it not convincing? There is not one tittle of evidence to confute it; not one tittle.

Now, whether their suspicions were well founded or not has not yet been fully ascertained. Allow me to show you how well founded their suspicions were that Longstreet's wing of the army was in their front. Colonel Marshall, commanding a New York regiment, testifies as follows:

Question. Will you now locate on the map where General Morell was when you had the conversation with him about dusk; this was about dusk you say: "General Morell told me that he had just received orders from General Porter to attack the enemy, and he commenced the attack with four regiments."
Answer. This force I speak of on the left was deployed perhaps about 3 o'clock; it might have been about 3.30 or 4 that I went out there. Between 3 and 4 I sent the first dispatch. It must have been about 4 o'clock, if not later, when I sent my second dispatch.
* * * * * * *
Q. How far back from Dawkin's Branch?
A. Down to just where the timber commenced.
Q. On the ridge?
A. Yes, not very far up on the ridge; far enough up, where the timber ends, so that he could have a view of everything going on as much as possible.
Q. You say that you told him that it was certain destruction to make any attack. Will you state the reason on which you formed that opinion?
A. The reasons were that there was a large enemy in my front. I can not tell what they were; they were mostly hidden in the timber. Then, also, this new development of troops on my left—that fretted me. And also prior to going upon picket I myself went off on my own hook. And when General Porter accompanied General McDowell, and made a reconnaissance of that same timber, I saw them go into the timber, and saw them returning. * * * In my observations that I made of that point to my left I saw a long line of dust, and I concluded there was a large army, at least a corps, moving down toward our front. The consequence was, when I went upon picket I was prepared in my mind to be received by a large force, and I was not mistaken. I found it just where I expected it to be from these observations made on this hill.

Major Hyland testifies, as follows:

Question. What is the character of the country there?
Answer. The country in front of us was quite heavily timbered. Between us and General Morell's division the country was an open country, with a deep ravine there and a stream running through it. In front of us it was heavily timbered, and there was also some scrub pine.
Q. Can you state about what force of the enemy took position in front and right of your regiment, as deployed in advance of General Morell's division, on the 29th?
A. I could not state the number, but it appeared to be a very large force indeed.
Q. Can you state how many thousands, or divisions, or regiments?
A. I could not state the number of thousands or divisions. I judged from the movements and from the commands given that there was a very large force indeed, probably a larger force than we had.
Q. Did you report this force to General Porter or to General Morell?
A. I reported it to Colonel Marshall, my commanding officer.

I read from the testimony of Lieutenant Stevenson:

Question. When you arrived at the location of the regiment could you see the enemy?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the impression you then formed as to his force?
A. I judged him to be between twelve and fifteen thousand.
Q. Did you see his force of different arms, infantry and artillery?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear anything to make you think he was receiving re-enforcements?
A. Yes, sir; I could see the dust rising in the rear of his force; it seemed as though they were moving toward the front.

There was the evidence of Lieutenant Stevenson, Lieutenant Davis, and Lieutenant Wilson to substantiate the same facts. So Major Williams, of the confederate service, General Early, General Robertson, and General Longstreet all testify to the presence of Longstreet's men in that position in front of General Porter and in line ready for action between 11 and 12 o'clock. I wish to call attention to the testimony of General Longstreet particularly:

Question. What force had you with you there?
Answer. I had, as near as I can recollect, twenty-five thousand men.
Q. Was General Lee there with you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How was this force of twenty-five thousand men divided; under what commanders—subordinate generals?
A. Divided into divisions organized by myself, three brigades each; one under General Jones, one under General Kemper, and two brigades, called a division, under Hood, which was organized into another division, really under General Evans, making three brigades. The command under General Hood, however, retained the name of Hood's division. There was a division under General Wilcox, composed of three brigades.
* * * * * * *
Q. How early did you come within supporting distance of Jackson?

Now it will be remembered, assuming this point [illustrating] to be Dawkin's Branch, Jackson was at that point [illustrating], Pope at that point in front of Jackson, and Porter over here at this point; and if this evidence is true, Longstreet had formed along here. The map prepared by General Grant does not represent quite correctly the situation; but, although the lines were not parallel with each other, Longstreet was substantially in front, occupying a somewhat oblique position with reference to Porter, but substantially in front.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether General Longstreet does not state in his report that Porter was threatening his right flank; and does not General J. E. B. Stuart in his official report state that Porter's column was threatening General Longstreet's right flank and rear?

Mr. BAYNE. I believe General Longstreet does so state in his report, but I want to say one word about reports since that question has been raised. If you take the reports of the generals commanding the armies in the late war you will find them as full of errors as they can well be. If you take for instance the reports of the generals of the two sides with reference to the transactions of the 29th of August, you will find that victory was claimed on both sides. That was of course impossible. Reports were drawn in the hurry of military operations and are often far from accurate. They do not represent that strict statement of facts which we know to be elicited by examination and cross-examination. I say that General Longstreet's testimony before the West Point board, where he was subjected to a rigorous cross-examination by the recorder, who showed not only great skill but great zeal in endeavoring to sustain the position taken by the court-martial—General Longstreet's examination-in-chief and his cross-examination by the recorder were infinitely better calculated to develop the truth than any reports made by anybody at the time of the events in question. I read further from General Longstreet's testimony:

Question. How early did you come within supporting distance of Jackson?
Answer. I think by 9 o'clock we were in supporting distance, if he called for us particularly. We could have made a move right across the country, instead of going down to Gainesville and then down the pike. If he had made any pressing call, I think we could have supported him by moving across. I never have been across that country since, however, and can not say positively.
Q. State how, as you came up to where Jackson's force was, you arranged and distributed your forces.
A. Hood's and Evans's troops were deployed at once, as well as I recollect; one brigade with Hood on one side of the turnpike and the other brigade on the other side, and Evans's brigade in the rear, probably one hundred yards—easy supporting distance; three brigades under General Wilcox were thrown to the left of the pike; the three brigades under General D. R. Jones to the right and extending up a little beyond the Manassas Gap Railroad; three brigades under General Kemper were thrown out in that direction, so as to be in easy supporting distance in case of need by General Jones; all arranged in double line, two brigades in front and one in the rear.
Q. Did you thus bring forward and distribute, on the line and in the manner you have stated, the whole of your force of twenty-five thousand men?
A. Yes; twelve brigades.
Q. How early in the day of the 29th had they thus been stationed by you?
A. I think they had been deployed by 11 o'clock in the day.

Now, in the face of this convincing evidence of General Longstreet, corroborated as he is by his chief of staff, Colonel Marshall, by General Robertson, now a reputable lawyer of Richmond, Va., by General Early, by Major Williams, corroborated and sustained as he is by the experience which Morell had when he made that advance at Dawkin's Branch, corroborated and sustained as he is by the three prisoners who were captured and taken to General Porter's headquarters, how can any man refuse to believe that Longstreet's wing of the rebel army was in Porter's front on that occasion, ready for battle?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. Is there any evidence that when General Porter received the order to attack he knew that fact except from certain dust in his front?

Mr. BAYNE. I have not yet come to consider the order to attack.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Well, when he received the joint order?

Mr. BAYNE. When he received the joint order he knew it; there is abundance of evidence that he knew it. When he received that order he had marched up to Dawkin's Branch. When McDowell came there he was at Dawkin's Branch. They halted there because they knew that Longstreet was in their front.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment that I may make a statement of facts? I was on that field myself.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not wish to yield much time, as I have so much matter to go over; but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I should not have said a word on this occasion except that in a conversation a moment ago with a Republican friend who believes that Fitz-John Porter was innocent I told him where I was on that day, and he said he wished I would state the fact to the House.

I belonged to Longstreet's corps.

Mr. KEIFER. What division?

Mr. HERBERT. Wilcox's division. I was under General Wilcox at that time. I know that we were deployed and in line before 12 o'clock. My impression was it was much earlier, but certainly it was before 12 o'clock. While we were in line there we waited, not knowing why it was we were not carried into the fight. On our left the battle was raging, and we could not understand it and I have never understood the reason for our idleness that day until I examined the testimony in this case.

Mr. STEELE. Was there not a battle on the 29th?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, on the left.

Mr. CALKINS. A very heavy one, too, colonel.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes. Now, then, we were not engaged in any battle on that day.

Mr. CALKINS. Wilcox's brigade went first to the left, as I understand General Longstreet's testimony—first, to your left, and then taken back to your right—is that so?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not understand the back movements we made. I only know the army was in line, and we were not engaged in any fight on that day.

I wish to say in addition just this one single thing. I do not believe, and thank God for it, that the Union Army or the confederate army during the late war furnished a Benedict Arnold. I do not believe that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor to his cause. If I did believe it I would be the very last man to excuse him from the consequences of his treason. [Applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. I think any honorable soldier would say the same.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have more matter from Longstreet's testimony I would like to read, but I have not time to do it. Really, in one hour it is impossible to go over the facts in this case in such a manner as they should be properly presented.

We have ascertained the fact, Mr. Chairman, that Longstreet's wing of the army was in Porter's front. What more? The order to Porter to attack, if he was ordered to attack there, came from some other source than the joint order, leaving out the 4.30 order, which I will come to if I have time. Now, was Porter ordered at that time to attack? General McDowell is the only witness who pretends to say he was. He alleges he said to Porter "Put your force in here." Subsequently, he said he meant by that that Porter should apply his force at that place. General McDowell, however, is the only person who testifies to that fact. Before the West Point board General McDowell testified that his order was very "vague." "I confess to you," he said before the West Point board, "my order was very vague;" and in another place in his evidence, "I do not know how General Porter may have understood it, but I meant Porter should apply his force there." Five witnesses testify, and they are not contradicted, and General McDowell does not contradict them, that General McDowell said to Porter when he came there, "Porter, you are too far out; this is no place to fight a battle." Five witnesses testify to that fact, and when General McDowell is asked whether he said that or not he replies he did not recollect whether he did or not.

Now, if General McDowell said that, is it possible, under the circumstances, he could have issued an order to attack when he said to Porter "You are too far out; this is no place to fight a battle;" that is, away from the enemy, could he have ordered Porter to apply his force there, that is, toward the enemy? These propositions are absolutely irreconcilable, and no logic, or reason, or ingenuity, or finesse can bring them together.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman another question, if he will permit me.

Mr. BAYNE. If time is given me I have no sort of objection. I have much matter yet to go over, and indeed I have really only begun the case. I can assure the gentleman from Michigan I do not wish to decline any courtesy toward him within the limit of the time allowed me under the rules.

I can show by the logic of facts, more trustworthy than what comes from the lips of any man, that General McDowell never intended to attack until he should come in on Reynolds's left and form a junction with Porter.

Mr. STEELE. He swore he did.

Mr. BAYNE. I have given you the benefit of all he said.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My question, if the gentleman will allow me, is on this point, and I hope the committee will indulge him if I take any of his time. It is this: Was not the entire object of the movement for Porter to press through and connect with our right wing, and would not an advance accomplish that, and would not a retreat retard it, and would not the logic of the facts be that McDowell would require an advance rather than a retreat?

Mr. BAYNE. The joint order did not say anything about going over to our right.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This kind of debate goes for nothing, but I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that there was no such movement contemplated on the part of our troops. The only movement which was contemplated by our various corps at that time was an uninterrupted march on Gainesville.

Mr. BAYNE. That is true. And now another thing. Let me call your attention to another point, Mr. Chairman. McDowell himself swears that he did not know where he was going when he left Dawkin's Branch with his command on that morning, but that his intention and his idea was that he should fall in on the left of Reynolds with a view to forming a junction with Porter, and thus complete the continuous lines of our forces in front of the enemy. McDowell himself swears, mark you, that he did not know that he was going to the right of Pope's army. General Porter did not know it. There is not a word in any order alluding to it, and if there was an earlier order which might have contemplated such a condition of affairs the joint order of a later date superseded it, because that contemplated, as soon as the junction was formed, that the troops should be held in a condition to fall back behind Bull Run.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, that is the very point to which I wished to refer, that the troops were directed to form a junction at that point, the whole Army to assemble there, with the view, if necessary, of falling back behind Bull Run.

Mr. BAYNE. But does not the gentleman see that if McDowell had gone in between Reynolds and Porter the junction would then have been completed and a continuous line formed? Is not that the fact?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not in the sense to which I refer.

Mr. BAYNE. If there would not have been a junction when this force came between the two wings of the army and joined them one to the other, let me ask what the gentleman would call it? It would have formed a continuous line; it was decidedly a junction, and such a junction as was contemplated. Nothing but a junction was mentioned. Where would Porter's force have been put if it had gone in there? Would you have had it doubled up on McDowell's force, and have Longstreet with his troops on the flank and nobody in force in his front? Would you have left Longstreet at liberty to fall on the flank of Pope's army and crush it?

Mr. CALKINS. Since my friend from Pennsylvania has stated that he will yield to interruptions if additional time is granted to him (which extension of time I sincerely hope will be granted), I wish to say to my friend just here, if he will permit me, that the difficulty I find with his argument is that Porter was then two miles from General Reynolds's left. His order was to march to Gainesville. His order was, as he understood it, and about which there is no question, that he was to take the flank of Jackson's force. If he found in his front a body of troops, I ask my friend from Pennsylvania to state to the committee what there was to prevent him from joining his corps to the left of Reynolds, and thus make the continuous line of battle he speaks of in front of the enemy?

Mr. BAYNE. The reasons have been fully stated in the testimony. In the first place, he tried to get across the country, but found that there was no other method of reacking the position than by the Sudley Springs road. He could not get his artillery over, though, as it is testified, he could have taken his infantry possibly. In the second place, it was certainly the view of General McDowell that his order was to fall in on Reynolds's left, so as to form this complete junction and continuous line; and that is as clear as can be, for General McDowell swears to it, and that testimony has not been refuted. Now, if he had fallen in there and formed a junction, the continuous line contemplated by the order—the very gist and meaning of that order—would have been adhered to, the result sought to be accomplished would have been gained, and no court-martial would have been convened. General Dowell shows that he marched and countermarched his force through the country, and that if he had had his own way there would have been the continuous line formed which was contemplated by the order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that my colleague's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BAYNE. About a half hour longer.

Mr. STEELE. I think I shall be compelled to object, for the reason that the gentleman has declined to answer any questions which were propounded to him on the ground that his time must be first extended.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not object, since the courtesy of an extension was given to him.

Mr. STEELE. I shall not insist upon the objection.

Mr. BAYNE. I told the gentleman at the time that I would cheerfully yield for questions if I could have time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire that an understanding should be arrived at with reference to this matter. This courtesy was extended to this side of the House in my own case, and also during the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana; but as General KEIFER is to follow in this discussion, I trust when that time comes if he shall want an extension it will be accorded to him, so that there may be full and free debate upon this subject and ample opportunity to express our opinions upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for thirty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CUTCHEON. With that understanding, I trust there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MAYO. There will be no objection if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consent to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. This is not debatable.

Mr. MAYO. I insist on it that the question shall be answered, otherwise I shall object.

Mr. BAYNE. I will answer the gentleman's question if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for thirty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire the two matters shall be coupled, so that the same consent shall be given hereafter.

Mr. RANNEY. You can not do that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again put the question. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAYO. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. BAYNE. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAYO. I will withdraw my objection if the gentleman will answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again put the question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] will proceed for thirty minutes.

Mr. MAYO. I did not intend to address the question so much to the gentleman on the floor as to other gentlemen. I understood him to say something about "party;" and I want to know if this is to be made a party question?

Mr. BAYNE. I hope not.

Mr. MAYO. I hope not also.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, if General McDowell's idea had been carried out of going in on Reynolds's left with his corps and forming a junction with Porter, which that movement would have necessitated, it is probable no court-martial would have taken place as to Porter. It is not likely as we now know the facts that any signal advantage would have resulted to our forces, but it would have carried out the letter of the joint order and so have obviated all criticism. I can not doubt but that the movement and conversation of McDowell led Porter to believe that he was going to do that. Indeed, this proposition is made clear by the evidence. General McDowell says in his testimony before the West Point board, in reply to a question:

Question. In that hour or hour and a half, whichever it was, your purpose was to be going around with your troops on the Sudley Springs road to General Reynolds, on the left, was it?

Answer. Yes; but I wish to say here that this judgment of mine was not only concurred in but anticipated by the petitioner himself. He says that it was at his suggestion that I should do this very thing.

Q. Do you recollect whose suggestion it was?

A. He says it was his own.

Q. Do you recollect whose it was?

A. I do not, because I intended to do it.

Now couple with this evidence the word sent by McDowell to Porter when the latter sent for King's division: "Give my compliments," said General McDowell, as I recollect it, "to General Porter, and tell him he had better remain where he is. I will take King with me. It it be necessary for him (Porter) to fall back, he can do so on my left," and you have almost a demonstration that McDowell and Porter understood each other at the time they conferred about the joint order, and that Porter carried out that understanding with entire fidelity. McDowell, too, would have carried out his part if he had not been ordered to do otherwise.

Independently, however, of all this, nobody has pointed out, and nobody can point out, any disobedience of Porter to the joint order. Such disobedience has simply no lodgment anywhere in the facts of this case.

4.30 ORDER.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have what is called the 4.30 order; and General Porter is charged with having violated that order. Now, let me say that that order was the only one Porter had received from the time he joined the Army of Virginia commanding him to attack the enemy.

Mr. CALKINS. Direct order.

Mr. BAYNE. The only direct order. He was not required by anything before to attack unless he was commanded by the principles of military law, which I will come to hereafter. Here is the order:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Major-General PORTER.

When this case was brought before the court-martial there were two witnesses examined with reference to the delivery of the order, Douglas Pope, a relation of General Pope, and Charles Duffee, his orderly.

Pope testified that order was delivered at 5 o'clock; not five minutes before or five minutes after. Duffee testified that order was delivered as he believed about half past 5 o'clock. Those were the only witnesses that swore to the delivery of that order. If you will examine their testimony you will find marked discrepancies between them besides the time of arrival, Douglas Pope swearing that they went at a fast gait all the way. Charles Duffee swears they walked a good part of the way, because the roads were so bad they could not ride faster.

Now, as controverting that evidence, hear what General Sykes and other witnesses say about the time the order was brought to Porter.

General Sykes testified before the court-martial:

I was with General Porter nearly throughout that whole day; that officer—

Officer bringing written order—arrived as near sunset as I can remember; certainly within a little before sunset or about sunset.

Colonel Locke testified:

Question. At what time was that message from General Pope delivered to General Porter?

Answer. Between sundown and dusk.

Captain Monteith:

Question. Did you on the afternoon of the 29th see a messenger from General Pope at General Porter's headquarters?

Answer. Yes, sir; Captain Pope.

Q. According to your recollection, what was the time when that messenger reached General Porter?

A. It was about sundown.

Lieutenant Ingham:

Question. Did you see a messenger arrive bearing a message from General Pope to General Porter?

Answer. I did.

Q. Would you recognize that messenger now should you see him?

A. Yes, sir; I think I should. (The witness indicated Douglas Pope, who was present, as the person who bore the message referred to.)

Lieutenant Weld:

Question. At what time did you get back?

Answer. I got back after sundown. I think it was a quarter to 7 o'clock when I got back, as near as I can recollect.

Q. Did you see Captain Pope that evening, or do you know him?

A. I do not know him.

Q. Did you see that evening one who professed to be a messenger from General Pope?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he there when you got back, or did he come afterward?

A. He came afterward.

These witnesses all swore before the original court-martial. Captain Randol, who was examined before the West Point board, says:

Question. About what time in the afternoon was it that you went to Porter's headquarters and saw this officer arrive with an orderly?

Answer. It was growing dark; must have been between 6 and 7 o'clock; it grew dark immediately afterward and was dark when I got back to my position.

Q. Did you recognize the officer who brought that dispatch?

A. I did not know him at that time.

Q. Did you ever see him afterward?

A. I did, at Centreville and other places; he was introduced to me and stated to be Captain Pope, of General Pope's staff.

There are all those witnesses who testify that that order was not delivered until about sundown. Now the question comes, did Porter violate that order? Well, if you will read the testimony of General Morell and the testimony of Colonel Locke and the testimony of General Griffin and others you will find that General Porter went to the front immediately on the receipt of that order; that he did not lie still with his head on his hand; that he sent Colonel Locke first, and immediately followed him, and directed an attack to be made; that forces were deployed and an advance made for the purpose of making an attack in obedience to that order; and that when these forces advanced, and when the officers in command, Colonel Marshall and others, discovered more fully the strong position of the enemy, who occupied an elevated piece of ground with an open space of several hundred yards in his front, which our troops would have been compelled to go over, they protested that it would be certain death.

When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] says that he sympathizes with those who suffered and died on that unfortunate day I join him in full measure. But will he not rejoice with me because others were not needlessly compelled to mingle their dying groans with the groans of those who had fallen?

If Porter had advanced that evening it would have only added many more names to the death-roll of that day. It is apparent to any man who will read the evidence in this case that not a solitary life would have been saved by an attack on the part of Porter, while many would have been lost.

Mr. STEELE. I want to know what advance was made by Porter, then. I undertake to say that there was no advance; that he made no advance whatever. On the contrary, he was going to the rear when this order for an attack was given; he had marched some distance to the rear.

Mr. BAYNE. I have cited the testimony of General Morell, but have not time to read it all. Colonel Locke testifies that they went in there, that Colonel Marshall advanced, and General Morell got his troops in position and was about to make the attack, but under the protestation of Colonel Marshall and others that it was too dark, and that the enemy were in a too strong position, they concluded to withdraw.

Nobody can read that evidence without coming to that conclusion. I have told you who the witnesses were, and if you will examine their testimony you will find that it is exactly what I say.

Mr. STEELE. Morell says that he would not attack because it was too late; that is all.

Mr. BAYNE. Another thing; the 4.30 order contemplated an attack on the rear or flank of Jackson's army. General Pope did not know that Longstreet had arrived when he wrote that 4.30 order; he had not seen Buford's dispatch when he wrote that order. He did not know that Longstreet had arrived in front; he assumed that it was within the power of Porter to attack the right wing of Jackson's army.

He swore before the court-martial that that was his impression. He swore before the court-martial that he did not believe at the time, nor did he believe then, when he was testifying, that Longstreet had arrived in Porter's front or on the field of battle. Now, if upon that testimony Porter was convicted by the court-martial, and if the testimony now produced, of Longstreet and Marshall, of his staff, and other witnesses, is proof that Longstreet was there with his twenty-five thousand men, and if according to their evidence we know, for it has become clear, that Porter knew that he was there, how can anybody hold Porter responsible for having violated an order the obvious purpose of which it was impossible for him to carry out? Could he have attacked Jackson's flank or rear at that hour, between sundown and dark? Could he have attacked Longstreet's flank or rear?

General Smith, who was a witness before the court-martial for the Government, testified before the West Point board that it would have taken at least two hours to have got into a position to attack the enemy's flank or rear. That would have made it nearly 9 o'clock before Porter could have attacked as directed by the 4.30 order.

What conclusion can be drawn from the state of facts which is now so obvious and clear? It is that General Porter knew better what the situation was than did General Pope, and that owing to the lateness of the hour, night having come on, the strength of the rebel position, and the impracticability of a flank or rear attack, it would have been a piece of insanity, as one witness stated, for him to have made an attack.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAYNE. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. BAYNE. I beg my friend's pardon; I would yield to him if I had time, but I have only twelve minutes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then will the gentleman consent to read the order of attack which General Porter gave to General Morell? I lay it before him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know what order the gentleman refers to just now.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The order of attack.

Mr. BAYNE. I have the floor and decline to be interrupted, as I have not time.

Colonel Locke was sent by General Porter immediately to the front with an order to General Morell to attack in pursuance of the 4.30 order. General Porter followed Colonel Locke immediately to the front to execute that 4.30 order. He delivered an order to Morell in person to attack, and not a written order at all.

COMMAND OF MILITARY LAW.

What is the other point remaining? I have no doubt the fact will be dwelt upon, as it has been heretofore, that Porter was bound to march to the sound of the enemy's guns. Now, it is in evidence by more than twenty witnesses that General Porter could not hear and did not hear that day the sound of musketry except an occasional shot. Generals Morell, Sykes, Butterfield, and Warren, Colonels Buchanan, Locke, and Marshall, Majors Earle and Hyland, and indeed everybody connected with the Fifth Corps who was examined on the subject, testified that they heard no musketry firing except an occasional shot. General Reynolds, who was at least two miles nearer the scene of action than General Porter, testified that he heard no musketry firing that day until about 5 o'clock. Therefore it is as clear as anything can be made that there was nothing heard that day by Porter except cannonading.

Mr. STEELE. Did not Colonel Marshall testify that he could see our armies swaying to and fro, could see the battle going on? Does not McDowell swear that he and Porter discussed the battle that was going on? Why, sir, there is plenty of evidence that he knew a battle was going on.

Mr. BAYNE. I quote the names of these witnesses who swear that they did not hear musketry firing that afternoon except an occasional shot, and I pit that against the gentleman's citation.

Mr. STEELE rose.

Mr. BAYNE. I decline to yield further. I am arguing my side of the case. I say General Reynolds swears he did not hear musketry firing until about 5 o'clock in the evening. The only thing left was the cannonading. There was cannonading, and that they heard. Porter heard it; the whole Fifth Corps heard it. General Porter sent out inquiries time and again until all his messengers were exhausted—he sent to McDowell, he sent to King, he sent to Sigel, to know what was going on and what the designs were. One of these dispatches was produced, and in that dispatch Porter said, "I shall fall back on Manassas; from the sound of the cannonading our forces are retiring." That was his idea, that our forces were retiring; yet he retained his position, doubtless awaiting definite information or an order as to what he should do. What is the meaning of cannonading? You hear the general statement of military law that a force is bound to march to the sound of the enemy's guns. Now, I believe there are more than a hundred men on this floor who participated in the late war of the rebellion on one side or the other. I ask any gentleman on this floor who took part in that war whether he does not know that cannonading is frequently unaccompanied by musketry firing——

Mr. MAGINNIS. Almost constantly.

Mr. BAYNE. Whether cannonading means anything like a battle in the sense of a close conflict with muskets and bayonets?

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir, I decline to yield; my time is nearly gone. I say that Porter knew and that every man who participated in the late war on one side or the other knows that cannonading is frequently carried on between contending forces without advancing upon each other, and without anything in the nature of a battle that would require an attack with musketry or bayonets.

But General Porter had sent messenger after messenger to ascertain what he should do. He had inquired until all his messengers were gone. He wanted to hear from McDowell. He sought information diligently that he might act intelligently. No word came to him. Suppose that battle between Pope's and Jackson's forces had been a mere cannonading contest; suppose it had been that and nothing more; under these circumstances would Porter have been justified in precipitating a battle with Longstreet? Suppose he had precipitated a battle and the result had been disastrous, as Longstreet and others say it would have been; would not Porter have been liable to be court-martialed for having advanced and engaged the enemy without an order so to do? Obviously to Porter's mind it was the intention of General Pope to get his forces joined together before making an attack. That was the evident purpose of all the orders he had received excepting the 4:30 order. It was conspicuously the purpose of the joint order; it was carried out on the 30th, when Porter with the Fifth Corps valiantly did their whole duty.

Now I wish to say one word in conclusion. General Porter's case is covered by two hours on the 27th of August and by six or seven hours on the 29th. Before that time he bore the reputation of being a brave and gallant soldier. He had participated in battle after battle. A number of them by name were cited by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON]. He had distinguished himself as a soldier. He had the confidence of his corps from the highest in rank down to the orderly and private; the loyalty of his corps, the loyalty of those under him, has never for one moment been questioned. Why, having the loyalty of that corps; why, having the approval of nearly every man in it as to how he did his duty; why, having the approval of those men who were upon the ground to see what he did, to know what he did, and appreciated what he did; why, having that jury of ten thousand intelligent American citizens applauding and approving his conduct—why shall we, who were outside and far away, collect disjointed facts, select him out and condemn him in face of a verdict of that kind? [Loud applause.]

Mr. KEIFER obtained the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Before the gentleman from Ohio commences his remarks, I ask as a matter of privilege that, by unanimous consent of the committee, in case he should find at the end of his hour he can not complete his argument, his time be extended for thirty minutes.

A MEMBER. Say fifteen.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I make this request now for the reason we all understand that if we can proceed fifteen or thirty minutes longer we will make a different argument to the House from what we would if we could not have that privilege. This privilege has not been denied to any speaker on this floor during the discussion of this bill. I ask, therefore, on behalf of the gentleman from Ohio that, by unanimous consent, if at the expiration of his hour he has not completed his remarks, his time shall be extended not to exceed fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield for one minute to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MAYO. A while ago I understood the gentleman who was speaking was a Democrat and that a Republican interrupted him, and that something was said about party. I simply asked if it was meant to make it a party question. He said not. I apologize, of course.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it is always a noble and gracious thing to do an act even of tardy justice to a fellow-man. There are, however, duties paramount to this where public safety is concerned. Where to vindicate an individual who claims to have been wronged involves the public weal it becomes important that no mistakes are made. General Porter seeks legislative action here to relieve him from a sentence of a legally constituted court-martial.

During this long debate it has seemed to me we were talking about a great many irrelevant things, forgetting the cardinal and real questions involved in this bill.

Let us first see of what he was charged and convicted. The charges on which General Porter was tried were two.

First. Violation of the ninth article of war. The part of that article applicable to his case is as follows:

Any officer or soldier * * * who shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall * * * be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial.

The first specification to this charge relates to the violation of the 6.30 p. m. order of August 27, 1862, given by his commanding general, to march at 1 a. m. of the following morning from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station, so as to be at the latter place by daylight the following morning.

The second specification to the same charge relates to the disobedience of the joint order of General Pope to him and General McDowell, dated August 29, 1862, and delivered to him (Porter) on the morning of that day.

The third specification to this charge relates to the failure to obey the order of his commanding officer, dated 4.30 p. m., August 29, 1862, and delivered to him shortly after its date, which order, among other things, commanded him to "push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank and if possible on his rear."

Charge 2. Violation of the fifty-second article of war, which reads, omitting parts not material to Porter's case:

Any officer or soldier who shall misbehave himself before the enemy, run away, * * * or speak words inducing others to do the like, * * * every such offender, being duly convicted thereof, shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be ordered by a sentence of a general court-martial.

The first specification supporting this charge alleges a disobedience of the 4.30 p. m. order of August 29, 1862, and that he (Porter) "did retreat from advancing forces of the enemy without any attempt to engage them or to aid the troops who were already fighting greatly superior numbers," &c.

Specification 2 to this charge is:

That the said Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, being with his army corps on Friday, the 29th of August, 1862, between Manassas Station and the field of a battle then pending between the forces of the United States and those of the rebels, and within sound of the guns, and in the presence of the enemy, and knowing that a severe action of great consequence was being fought and that the aid of his corps was greatly needed, did fail all day to bring it on to the field, and did shamefully fall back and retreat from the advance of the enemy without any attempt to give them battle, and without knowing the forces from which he shamefully retreated. This near Manassas Station, in the State of Virginia, on the 29th of August, 1862.

Specification third to this charge is:

That the said Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, being with his army corps near the field of battle of Manassas, on the 29th of August, 1862, while a severe action was being fought by the troops of Major-General Pope's command, and being in the belief that the troops of the said General Pope were sustaining defeat and retiring from the field, did shamefully fail to go to the aid of the said troops and general, and did shamefully retreat away and fall back with his army to the Manassas Junction, and leave to the disasters of a presumed defeat the said army, and did fail, by any attempt to attack the enemy, to aid in averting the misfortunes of a disaster that would have endangered the safety of the capital of the country. This at or near Manassas station, in the State of Virginia, on the 29th day of August, 1862.

General Porter was, on January 10, 1863, by a lawfully constituted court-martial, found guilty on the three specifications to the first charge; and, with the exception of some unimportant words, he was found by such court guilty on the three specifications stated to the second charge. The court thereupon found him guilty on both the charges.

The sentence of the court was as follows:

And the court do therefore sentence him, Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, of United States volunteers, to be cashiered, and to be forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

After a careful review of the case the President of the United States approved and confirmed the proceedings in language following:

JANUARY 21, 1863.

The foregoing proceedings, findings, and sentence in the foregoing case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter are approved and confirmed, and it is ordered that the said Fitz-John Porter be, and he hereby is, cashiered and dismissed from the service of the United States as major-general of volunteers and as colonel and brevet brigadier-general in the regular service of the United States, and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The court-martial that tried General Porter was composed of the distinguished officers, namely:

Maj. Gen. D. Hunter; Maj. Gen. E. A. Hitchcock; Brig. Gen. Rufus King; Brig. Gen. B. M. Prentiss; Brig. Gen. James B. Ricketts; Brig. Gen. Silas Casey; Brig. Gen. James A. Garfield; Brig. Gen. N. B. Buford, and Brig. Gen. J. P. Slough. Joseph Holt, Judge-Advocate-General of the United States Army, was the judge-advocate and recorder of the court. Reverdy Johnson, a most eminent attorney, with other counsel, represented the defense.

Of the men, the distinguished officers who composed this court, two alone are living, the president of the court and General James B. Ricketts.

Mr. CALKINS (from his seat). Also General Prentiss.

Mr. KEIFER. And I am informed that General Prentiss is also living. My information was otherwise.

But all the others have gone to render their final account to their God, and we are here to-day, as I shall show before I close, trying in the most singular, unjustifiable, and strange way to heap condemnation on all of those gallant men, and for the purpose of vindicating, as it is called here upon the floor, a man who was condemned after having had a trial which was fairly conducted, as was said not only by the Judge-Advocate-General of the United States, but by that most distinguished of counsel who represented the defense Reverdy Johnson.

It is a singular and strange fact that during all that long trial there was no serious exception taken to any ruling of that court.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM], in the course of the remarks made by him in the opening of this debate a few days ago, assailed this court, and went aside to say that General Rufus King went down from his high position as a member of the court and became a principal witness in the case. I was curious to know how much of truth there was in that assertion, and I find among the hundreds and hundreds of pages of testimony that the testimony of Rufus King is comprised in a space of less than one-quarter of a page of the printed report, and that, too, of a comparatively immaterial character. It is not unusual or irregular for a judge in a civil court to give testimony to a jury. But this was the only thing that could be magnified into an attack upon that honorable court. These men were distinguished for conservatism; they were not politicians. Many of them were graduates of West Point. Some of them were men of mature years, and all were careful and jealous of the rights of their fellow-officers. All of them were men certainly the peers, and, if we are to test them by what we see in the record, more than the peers, of the distinguished men who assume, it is claimed, to overrule the result of their calm, deliberate action.

It is proposed to overturn the whole action of this high court, the members of which were solemnly sworn to discharge their duty impartially and fairly, and this on the report of an unauthorized board of inquiry convened sixteen years after General Porter was legally tried and convicted. It is proposed now to condemn the members of the court and the action of President Lincoln in approving its sentence by adopting a report of such board made partly upon unsworn statements laid before it and on statements made by selected witnesses friendly to General Porter, to whom in no case was more than an extrajudicial oath administered. Many of the material witnesses before the court were not summoned before this board to testify, others whose testimony was of the most important character were in their graves, and yet this board of three officers assumed to find that the court-martial and the President of the United States, acting under the law and charged with the grave responsibility of giving General Porter a fair trial, did not do so. The witnesses, many of them coached by the accused and his friends for years, had forgotten much and imagined things to exist that when their memories were fresh they would not have stated. Matters alleged to have existed at the time of the battle of the second Bull Run, and which could by no possibility have been known to General Porter at the time of his disobedience of his commanding officer's orders, were accepted by the board as excusing him from obeying orders. These matters could only be shown by the reports, letters, and other statements of confederate officers who could not be reached at the trial. Porter was ignorant of such alleged facts when he disobeyed General Pope's order, and hence they could not excuse his conduct. Fortunately the record of the proceedings of the board of inquiry tells us how its members understood and discharged their supposed duty.

I beg your special attention now for a moment or two while I show you what is most extraordinary, in view of the claim that this board is to be given great weight, and its proceedings regarded with peculiar sanctity, so much as to warrant you upon its recommendation in overturning the findings of that court-martial which was organized under the laws of the United States, and also in reversing the action of the immortal Lincoln in approving the sentence of the court.

After the board of inquiry had time and again ruled out testimony that was most clearly competent as against General Porter, and time and again ruled in testimony that no court of any kind would have ever dreamed was competent, General Terry, who, I presume, had some of the glimmerings about him yet of a lawyer, which he was once, thought it was about time for him, for his future honor at least, to state why the board outraged every rule of law relating to the admission of testimony in the conduct of the case. And I beg now to read it, that it may be understood before we give the report of this board of inquiry any weight at all. Terry says, reading it—he seems to have prepared it; it was not a mere outgush from the man's mind. He says:

In the opinion of the board there is one feature of this case which should be kept constantly in mind and which is of great importance in determining questions of evidence, which is that the application of the petitioner is made to the pardoning power; his application is for executive action. The board was not appointed to retry the original case. There is no authority for such a proceeding. But its duty is after-hearing all the evidence presented to it to advise the President what justice may require to be done.

Then he says:

Now, it seems to the board that it should admit any evidence which it would be proper for the President to listen to, were he personally examining the case with a view to determining whether or not he should exercise his constitutional power of pardon. On the application for the exercise of the pardoning power, nothing can be more pertinent than evidence that one of the witnesses declares contrary to or inconsistent with the testimony given by him at the trial. No authority vested with the power to pardon should refuse to listen to such evidence.

Skipping along, he says:

These facts in the opinion of the board amply justify a departure from the rule which requires that a cross-examination should precede the proof of inconsistent declarations.—Senate Document 2008, pages 1054, 1055.

General Terry had in his mind that if General Porter had been imprisoned they might have proved, as tending to vindicate him, his good conduct while a convict in a cell. He looked at it as though they must try him by things that took place after the conviction more than those before. And so they admitted testimony in that view.

But the president of the board, not a good lawyer, not a lawyer at all, was not patient under this more careful statement of General Terry, and he burst out at that point to tell us how he viewed it; and let me read that:

The board desire to add to that also that the military code under which we are acting, whether it be the common law of the military service or the Articles of War as interpreted by uniform decisions of courts, impartially forbids any distinction in our action or in our minds between any testimony given by an officer of the Army under oath before a court-martial and his deliberate statements—either in the form of official reports or other declarations.

Meaning out of court—

He proceeds:

The obligation is held universally to be the same in both cases. The penalty for falsehood in military estimation is the same in both.

Whether a man had indulged in loose talk on the streets or elsewhere or had written a letter or had sworn to it before a court, this president of the board of inquiry thought the same solemnity should be attached to all alike. All the members of that board acted, in that rehearing as they call it of that case, on that theory. And what does he say about accepting the evidence?

Therefore we did not and can not in this case recognize any difference between the sworn testimony presented here of record in the trial of Fitz-John Porter before a court-martial and deliberate statements in reference to that important case designed to affect either public interest or personal rights. We therefore admitted all printed published declarations of witnesses before that court to be considered here in that light.

So that anything, everything was regarded as testimony; and when they got through they summed up and say "in the light of the evidence we find certain facts."

I give this, Mr. Chairman, in order to fix particularly the assumed nature and character of this illegal and illegally constituted board. Of the individual members of the board as soldiers I have nothing to say but the kindliest things. General Schofield as well as General Terry were distinguished officers; and General George W. Getty, the other member of the board, less spoken of here on the floor, is the peer of either of them as I believe, and I think I know from long personal contact with him in the field. But when the board assumed a grave duty and acted as though it rested upon it thus lightly; when they took no lawful oath to try the case, and were under no obligations to do anything more than perhaps what Generals Terry and Schofield say, as I have read—that is, in effect, to find an excuse for the pardoning power—then its action should not be cited to control or govern this body when it undertakes to review the case.

As an illustration, the Schofield board reached the conclusion that evidence—using their language—"of bad animus" on Porter's part is immaterial. Such a conclusion stamps the whole proceedings with condemnation. In all prosecutions for crime, the animus with which the act is committed is of the first importance. Certain acts of a criminal character imply bad purpose and guilty knowledge. Bad intention on the part of the accused must in some cases be proved to enable the court or jury to find guilt. If it can be shown by the words or acts of General Porter prior to his alleged disobedience of orders that he was disloyal to his commanding officer and had an aversion to being in his command and had a settled purpose to go with his own command away from him and from the scene of the impending battle, it will be easy to understand his delays and failures to obey positive orders or to move into battle when the angry roar of cannon and the rattle of musketry summoned him there and to duty.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I would like the general to answer me a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Be brief.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Does not the general know that the Army is full of grumblers always, and that the people who grumble at their superior officers can not justly be accused of a liability to fail their country because they are ill-natured about their officers? Is not that the experience of all?

Mr. KEIFER. My distinguished friend may know more about grumbling in the Army than I do. But when I served with him and under him I never grumbled at him. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ROSECRANS. Thank you.

Mr. KEIFER. I had the honor to be near the gentleman in about the first battle (Rich Mountain) of the war, if not with him.

Mr. HORR. And you obeyed his orders, I suppose.

Mr. KEIFER. General Porter reported to General Pope in person the morning of the 27th of August, 1862, at Warrenton Junction, having been ordered to do so at Aquia Creek on his return from Harrison's Landing. At 4 p. m. of that same day he sent a dispatch to General Burnside using the following among other expressions, which my distinguished friend from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] would call grumbling. Let us listen for a moment or two to the grumbling:

We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and I presume will get there in a few days if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent and tactics in the inverse proportion. I was informed to-day by the best authority that in opposition to General Pope's views this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac, an army that could take care of itself. Most of this is private, but if you can get me away do so.

The confederate army was around him and he was telegraphing to be gotten away. On the same day he sent the same officer another dispatch, using this language:

Please hasten back the wagons I sent down, and inform McClellan, that I may know that I am doing right.

The significance of this will appear a little further on. Again, on August 28, he dispatched to the same officer:

All that talk about bagging Jackson is bosh. That enormous gap, Manassas, was left open, and the enemy jumped through. The story of McDowell having cut off Longstreet had no foundation. The enemy destroyed an immense amount of property at Manassas—wagons and supplies. I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by Longstreet, who was cut off.

Another dispatch to the same officer, by General Porter, dated Bristoe, August 28, 9.30 in the morning, closes as follows:

I hope for the best. My lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and I hope McClellan's is up also. You will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria.

That is, we will have retreated there in a short time.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Was he not pretty near right in all these things?

Mr. KEIFER. By his conduct it became a fulfilled prophecy. To the same officer he telegraphed again from Bristoe at 6 in the morning of August 29:

Heintzelman and Reno are at Centreville, where they marched yesterday. Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the enemy, and when Sigel was fighting within eight miles of him and in sight. Comment is unnecessary. I hope Mac's at work, and we will soon be ordered out of this. It would seem from proper statements of the enemy that he was wandering around loose, but I expect they know what they are doing; it is more than any one here or anywhere knows.

The foregoing and other language like it enables us to see the then state of Porter's mind, and to discern his purpose of future bad action so far as loyalty to his commanding general was concerned. These dispatches need no critical analysis to enable us to know, first, that he did not want or intend to fight under Pope; second, that while he regarded the enemy in great strength around him, he wanted at once to get away and to be ordered out; third, that his disloyalty to General Pope was so great that he wanted General McClellan to be informed of it, that he might know that he was "doing right," and that is the interpretation General McClellan put on it; fourth, that in advance of a battle he prophesied what by his subsequent action was fulfilled: "You will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria." That indicated a settled purpose on his part to so behave as to ultimately retreat to that place.

Other significant deductions might be drawn from these dispatches. His dispatch from Bristoe Station, dated 6 a. m. August 29, was written while he was delaying obedience to the order to move to the battlefield at the first dawn of day that same morning. Instead of moving by the dawn of day of the morning of the 29th to the battlefield, where he had been summoned by an order dated 3 o'clock of that same morning, we find him at 6 o'clock at Bristoe Station, writing a dispatch to General Burnside, away off somewhere, asking to be taken away from there. Afterward he offers excuses about not being able to obey the order, although at 6 o'clock in the morning the sun was shining high in the heavens.

It was a matter more important to him to write a dispatch, disloyal to General Pope, than to hasten with his troops to the scene of the engagement; and the dispatch to Burnside that Pope had gone to Centreville with two corps as a body-guard was not only shamefully disrespectful to his commanding general but it was absolutely false, for he had no knowledge of that kind and it never was the fact.

After this clear insight into the motives, purposes, designs, and unmilitary conduct of General Porter, we hardly need to expect less than flagrant disobedience of any important orders General Pope might issue to him. It is easy to believe General McDowell's statement, made under oath before the court-martial, that he told General Porter, "You put your forces in here" (pointing in the direction of the enemy); and thereupon Porter (putting his hand in the direction of the dust rising above the tops of the trees) answered: "We cannot go in there anywhere without getting into a fight." Poor fellow! He was not there to fight; but to be heard from "by way of Alexandria," as he was shortly after. The reply of General McDowell to that unmanly and cowardly remark of General Porter was good and soldierly: "That is what we came here for, General Porter." But the reply had no effect on Porter. He adhered persistently throughout the day to his purpose not to engage the enemy.

Before dismissing the question of the animus of Porter, I wish to give the judgment of his best friend on his conduct during those momentous days, including the second Bull Run—the friend to whom he appealed through his dispatches to know whether he was doing right. This friend may be assumed to have known him and his motives, and no doubt interpreted his actions better than could any other person living. He had his anxious eyes upon him, and not disinterestedly either. Promptly on learning of his bad conduct this officer was alarmed, and fearing it would be repeated, he wrote him from the War Department at Washington a letter such as only a guilty man could complacently receive without regarding it as a gross assault upon his honor as a soldier. Here is the convincing letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 1, 1862—5.30 p. m.

This was two days after the close of the battle in and around Manassas. Listen!

I ask you, for my sake, that of the country, and of the old Army of the Potomac, that you and all friends will lend the fullest and most cordial co-operation to General Pope in all the operations now going on. The distresses of our country, the honor of our arms, are at stake, and all depends upon the cheerful co-operation of all in the field. This week is the crisis of our fate. Say the same thing to all my friends in the Army of the Potomac, and that the last request I have to make of them is that for their country's sake they will extend to General Pope the same support they ever have to me.

I am in charge of the defenses of Washington and doing all I can to render your retreat safe, should that become necessary.

GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

Major-General PORTER,
Centreville, commanding Fifth Corps.

Listen to the opening sentence again:

I ask of you for my sake—

To do what? To do what you have not been doing—to be loyal to your commanding officer. No; General McClellan would have cut his right arm off before he would have addressed such a note as that to General Rosecrans, General Sheridan, General Phil. Kearny, or any other of the host of loyal generals of this country who were always ready to bound to the place of duty whenever duty called. [Applause.] Nothing but a settled conviction on the part of General McClellan that Porter had been a traitor to Pope ever induced him to write that letter. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will not draw me away from the line of my argument.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Did not General McClellan write that letter at the request of President Lincoln, assuring President Lincoln that in his belief no such letter was necessary?

Mr. KEIFER. Then General McClellan had the concurrence of President Lincoln that Porter was disobeying orders. [Applause.] I do not know whether General McClellan was requested to write that letter or not, but if he was, that is the answer.

I want to go back for a moment to the report of the board of inquiry. I want to refer to one matter which will perhaps come in here as well as anywhere else. I suppose I am at liberty to conclusively presume that Porter and his friends here on this floor and elsewhere believe that this board of inquiry was right on this point. Let me read it:

Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union army from the defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration. The only seriously critical period of that campaign, namely, between 11 a. m. and sunset of August 29, was thus safely passed.

Now this board finds that General Porter, by his "masterly inactivity," by his retiring when the enemy showed himself in his front, by his refusal to go into battle that day when on his right there raged a great battle, as we shall presently show—General Porter, it would seem (the board concluded) by absolutely refusing to fight at all saved a great disaster; that is, those already engaged succeeded better without him than they would with him, although he had under his command on that field at that time about one-half of the regular troops then in the United States service.

This I give simply as a sample. The members of the board found by not fighting, by not going into battle at the sound of musketry and the cannon's roar, he saved the army from getting whipped.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Was not the finding of the court that he did not retreat?

Mr. KEIFER. I will state there are some portions of the language of one of the specifications in reference to which they found him not guilty. I think the particular language was not that he did not retreat, but that he did not retreat when the enemy was pressing him.

Mr. ROSECRANS. You read in a very loud voice the charge that he was retreating. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether it was not the finding of the court-martial that of that charge he was not guilty? Did not the court except that from its finding?

Mr. KEIFER. No; the court found him guilty of the specification, but it excepted that part of the specification which related to his retreating while the enemy was pressing him; he got off before they got near him. [Laughter.]

It was alleged before the court of inquiry that General Fitz-John Porter did right in not literally obeying the order to march to the battlefield, and they set forth in support of that view that there is a discretion to be exercised by a subordinate officer in obeying orders. General Grant's letter, which makes up a large part of the brains in the report of the majority of the military committee—for the author of the report must have supposed he belonged to that same three hundred characterized by him the other day as know-nothings—General Grant's letter, I repeat, says: "It is never true that a subordinate has a right to exercise discretion on the subject of obeying his superior officer's order if a battle is raging."

Now, we will soon see whether there was not a battle raging. A discretion is only exercised when the conditions under which the order was issued are changed and when the changed condition could not have been known to the officer giving it. The discretion of an officer relates to means, not ends. It relates to his doing more than his order requires, not less. He is to interpret his order when a battle is raging to do everything within his power with all his command. The soldier's mission is to fight. War is without affection; it means devastation, destruction, death. It never justifies a subordinate officer in so interpreting an order as not to require him to go into battle with his command on account of his own personal safety or that of his troops.

I need not in this presence discuss the question of discretion on the subject of obeying an order. Almost one-half, if not quite one-half, of the members of this House have been officers or soldiers on one side or the other in the most memorable, sanguinary, and destructive of all modern wars, and to either side may I confidently appeal to support the point I make, that it is never the duty of an officer to retreat in the presence of an enemy when any of his fellow-soldiers are in the conflict.

The military authorities lay down the only safe and wise rule. De Hart, in his admirable work, has collected the experience and judgment of all the ages in the rule he lays down when he says:

Hesitancy in the execution of a military order is clearly, under any circumstances, a serious offense, and would subject one to a severe penalty, but actual disobedience is a crime which the law has stigmatized as of the highest degree, and against which is denounced the severe penalty of death.

Now, did Porter disobey orders? I will spend but a little time, for I have not much to spare, on this subject. It is admitted—and I have tried to keep on undisputed ground—it is admitted, Mr. Chairman, that General Porter received an order prior to 1 o'clock on the morning of the 28th of August, when he was at Warrenton Junction, ordering him to move at 1 o'clock a. m. to Bristoe Station, and which order commanded him to reach there by daylight. Nobody disputes that. He was nine miles away from Bristoe Station. He called his officers about him and showed the order to them late at night, not 1 o'clock at night; but he told them there was something to sleep on; not to execute, but to sleep on. One o'clock came and he had not moved. It is said that the head of his column moved at 3 o'clock, and he executed that great march of nine miles with his command, reaching Bristoe Station after 10 o'clock next day. He could have marched it, reaching there at the time he did, after 7 o'clock in the morning, and not marched more than three miles an hour. Two and a half miles an hour is ordinary and easy marching, including rests, for large bodies of troops.

I take nobody's testimony on that question. I stand here in the presence of a score and more of men who know the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station, who, as well as myself, at different times have marched over it by night and by day with infantry troops in much less than three hours. They say the road was blocked that night by wagons. Instead of being a narrow gorge or defile and being difficult to go through, it was a double road (one either side of the railroad), and on each side for a full mile you could march a command with artillery anywhere you pleased on that summer night. Troops could better march outside of the road than in the dust in it.

Then he disobeyed that order. But we are told it made no difference, because Pope was mistaken, and no battle was fought at daylight in the morning, and Porter for this reason was justified in disobeying it. Now, that is not an excuse for disobeying an order to be given by any officer or which should be considered for a moment. A single deserter from the Army might be arrested and taken back and when tried truthfully say: "Why, I deserted, but before you arrested me and while I was absent there was no fighting for me to do. Now, do not shoot me for that act, for I have done no harm in trying to escape and I am now here."

It is said it was too dark to march troops before the break of day on the morning of the 28th of August. It did not rain, and there could have been no extraordinary darkness. Longstreet could easily march his confederate troops all night, and the brave, faithful General Ricketts, who found himself with his division at Thoroughfare Gap, between Longstreet's and Jackson's corps, marched all night to extricate his soldiers and be ready in the early morning to obey his commanding general's orders to engage in the fight.

But it was Porter's duty to be where his commanding general apprehended danger. That sort of an excuse is not one that should come ever from anybody, let alone from a trained soldier.

I do not stop, Mr. Chairman, to read the testimony in this connection to prove that he disobeyed the joint order to McDowell and himself to move to the field of battle early on the morning of the 29th. I do not care enough about it. I do not think that a soldier fit to command a corps in the armies of the United States needs to have an express order to move to the battlefield when the thunder of cannon was sounding in his ears. [Applause.] General Porter also excuses himself because he says (in one of his petitions, I believe) he gave a double construction to that order. The double construction which he gave was always such that he had one alternative, not to go into the fight, and that is the alternative he always adopted. But he was commanded by that order to move to the battlefield, and he did move in that direction; but as he approached it and found the enemy (Stuart's cavalry dragging brush) in sight, he did not proceed to attack or reconnoiter, but he veered off from the proper field, retreated toward Manassas, and settled himself down like a Christian gentleman, I suppose, under the eaves of Bethlehem church. [Laughter.] He said he could not obey the order delivered to him, dated 4.30 p. m. on the afternoon of the 29th, because it was received too late. But on his own statement it was still not too late to have gone into the engagement, for he pretends to have attempted the execution of the order. But give him even to the hour of 6 o'clock, which is after the time the order was received. We find by the official reports of Union officers and confederate officers, from commanding generals down, that they were able to fight until 9 o'clock that night within easy hearing of the ears of General Porter. Then he had three hours in which he could have gone to the relief of his comrades, already at death grips in that bloody conflict. I will not stop to weigh that testimony, but give you another circumstance, which is, to my mind, most significant.

General Sykes, loyal to General Porter then, was willing to swear and did swear before the court that when the 4.30 p. m. order was delivered to Porter he concealed its contents, and although he spent that evening and all the coming night with him he never learned that Porter had that order to go into battle, although he was a division commander and waiting to receive orders from him. Nay, he did not tell his officer next in rank to him that he was ordered to move his whole corps into the battle. Sykes did not hear of the order until the next day. It is true that Porter, after receiving and concealing the order, dispatched Morell, whose division was in front of Sykes's, directing him to take four regiments and deploy skirmishers in there and make an attack, looking out meanwhile well for his rear. And that is all that we learn of the attempt made by him to comply with this order. Some officer had reported to Morell that the enemy were advancing, and said they seemed to be in great force. "A whole brigade" was the language used. That report went to Porter at almost the very moment he received the 4.30 p. m. order to go into the battle. He thus had notice from Morell that there was a whole brigade advancing in his front, but he sent out four regiments and had them soon after withdrawn, and now his friends claim that he did the best he could to execute the order.

But Porter is excused by the board and by others. They claim that if he had gone into the battle at that time he would have encountered a superior force and met with a disaster. I do not shrink, Mr. Chairman, from wrestling with this question also, for it is capable of complete and perfect demonstration that such is not the case. But what if it had been? Suppose it to be true. Suppose as a matter of fact that Porter had Longstreet's whole corps before him. He did not know it. Some of these men pretend to say that he knew more than anybody else knew in reference to the matter. But Morell, who was in front, did not so report; and there is that grand, gallant soldier, Col. B. F. Smith, gone to his long account years ago, who says that during the whole of that day he was all the time on the advance line, and so swears in the testimony before the court-martial; that he was all day sending the latest news as to the presence and force of the enemy, and he was not able to discover a considerable force before them; and yet it was through Smith that Porter got his information. Porter did not know Longstreet was before him, if it was true that he was there. But was it true that there was an overwhelming force in his front?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection, if I have sufficient time.

Mr. ROSECRANS. How far is it from Thoroughfare Gap to the field of battle?

Mr. KEIFER. The exact distance I can not state.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is about nine miles.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that is about the distance.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Do we not know Ricketts had left Thoroughfare Gap before Longstreet occupied it on the 29th?

Mr. KEIFER. We know Ricketts retired from it in the night, but we did not know Longstreet was coming to the position he took on the field any more than to any other.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Had not Ricketts got out of the gap because he was afraid of being overwhelmed?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes. Ricketts was of the court-martial; and he knew all that country and the distances better than General ROSECRANS or myself can know them. He was seriously wounded in the first Bull Run, and he fought his division through the whole of the second.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It would be a fair thing for the House to hear the gentleman say in his argument whether or no General Ricketts left that gap early in the day because he was overwhelmed?

Mr. KEIFER. He left that gap at night because Stonewall Jackson's troops were between him and Pope's main force.

Mr. ROSECRANS rose.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will pardon me. I can not be diverted from my present line of argument unless my time is extended further. I want to read from the report of the confederate general J. E. B. Stuart on the subject of troops in front of Porter. Referring to the approach of an enemy from the direction of Bristoe Station, he says:

The prolongation of his line of march would have passed through my position, which was a very fine one for artillery as well as for observation, and struck Longstreet in flank. I waited his approach long enough to ascertain that there was at least an army corps—

That was Porter's—

at the same time keeping detachments of cavalry dragging brush down the road in the direction of Gainesville so as to deceive the enemy—a ruse which General Porter's report shows now was successful. And I notified the commanding general, then opposite me on the turnpike, that Longstreet's flank and rear was seriously threatened, &c.

It seems Longstreet was there with some of his troops, but Stuart, commanding only cavalry, seeing a whole corps of infantry was coming on his flank, deceived Porter by dragging brush along the Gainesville road and raising dust. And this dust was enough to turn this now-claimed-to-be great hero off with his entire corps in search of a church under the shadow of which he might lie in peace.

The same thing will be found in General Lee's letter to Porter dated the 31st of October, 1867. I come now to the question as to whether Longstreet's whole corps was there; and some very singular things crop out. I admit there is a letter here dated in 1870, signed by General R. E. Lee, stating in general terms that Longstreet's whole corps was up in the afternoon of the 29th. But before me is a letter of General Lee bearing date the 31st of October, 1867, in which he says, speaking of the troops which had come up:

Longstreet's whole force, except Anderson's division, was up, and that arrived next morning.

Then Anderson's division, according to Lee, did not get up till next morning. Now, I state here upon the authority of men within the sound of my voice that General D. H. Hill's division of Longstreet's corps did not arrive until after the battles of Bull Run were fought and ended, including the 30th of August. If there is any man here who belonged to that division he will not deny it, and of course if D. H. Hill's division of Longstreet's corps, as he reports—and there is abundant other testimony to same effect—did not reach the battle-field of Bull Run or Manassas, then we have got, according to General Lee's letter as to Anderson's division, the fact established that two divisions of that corps were not there on the 29th.

Instead of having that corps of Longstreet's, twenty-five thousand strong, there, we have two divisions away; and I will presently show what is still worse for Porter's case. The battle was raging, and I will show you in a moment or two that there was a great battle raging, and the critical hour of the battle had come, when General Pope, discerning, as a great general ought to discern, that the supreme moment had come, sent that 4.30 order to Porter to attack at once, and Porter should have obeyed it, because Pope had put in all his other available troops. General T. J. Jackson—Stonewall Jackson—says the attack was so impetuous, so persistent, and so overwhelming, that he appealed to the commanding general, Robert E. Lee, for assistance; and he says but for the timely arrival upon his right of Longstreet's forces the issue of the battle might have been different. Who came there? Who went there? General Hood's division of Longstreet's corps left Porter's front and went in on Jackson's right, and attacked the troops under Pope on his left at the critical moment. At this juncture Porter should have certainly been in the fight. Not Hood's division alone, but the brigade of Evans from the corps of Longstreet joined Hood's division and also went into the fight, and turned the battle against the Union forces, when poor, cringing Porter was laying off on his elbow, resting his head upon his hand, waiting for some excuse to move his troops farther to the rear. I see before me one who wears the insignia of war, an empty sleeve—Colonel OATES, of Alabama—and he was there under Lee, and knows whether Hood's division and Evans's brigade of Longstreet's corps went in and decided that conflict at a critical moment.

Now we have three divisions away from Longstreet's corps, and yet Porter says he could not safely attack. Wilcox's division is left, out of which Evans's brigade may have come. Of course there was cavalry there; Porter could not go in; he might get whipped!

But he has written letters since to find what the situation and number of the troops were in his front. He put the question and asked for a categorical answer from General Robert E. Lee to know what would have been his fate if he had fought, and Lee, a judicious, careful, and prudent soldier, said:

The probable result of an attack on Longstreet after 12 m., with less than twelve thousand men, would have been a repulse.

"The probable result." Then we find this officer of our Army protecting himself behind the probability that he would have been repulsed if he had fought, and hence he claims to have been justified in disobeying the orders of General Pope. Had he attacked, Lee could not possibly have used Hood's division and Evans's brigade of Longstreet's corps to support Jackson in his battle with other troops under General Pope. If the effect had been by Porter's attack on Longstreet, as ordered, to have kept Hood and Evans there, then Pope would have overwhelmed Jackson's forces, as Jackson in his report says he apprehended, and we would still have had a complete victory, still have had success; and if there had been no other object on the part of General Pope in ordering Porter into this battle than to keep Longstreet's forces employed, whatever were there, it would have been a sufficient reason for his issuing that order.

I do not care to stop and read all these reports; I do not care to get into these questions. I have stated the main features and the main facts.

It is said that there was no great battle raging. I do not know how far it is proper to use the testimony of others on this floor which I would like to use. There is certainly one gentleman [Mr. OATES] who rode to that battlefield after the battle was over, after the troops had marched off. He went back there to view the sad scenes of death and destruction. He tells me that when he reached the scene of this conflict of the evening of the 29th of August, 1862, he was obliged to dismount from his horse and tie him, so that he might get along among the dead; that there were so many dead there that he could not ride without his horse trampling on them.

Stonewall Jackson was not mistaken when he said that there was a a battle there. Speaking of the conflict of the evening of the 29th, he says:

As one line was repulsed another took its place and pressed forward, as if determined by force of numbers and fury of assault to drive us from our position. So impetuous and well sustained were these onsets as to induce me to send to the commanding general for re-enforcements; but the timely and gallant advance of General Longstreet on the right relieved my troops from the pressure of overwhelming numbers and gave to those brave men the chances of a more equal conflict.

Jackson referred in his report to the attack of Hood's division and Evans's brigade of Longstreet's corps.

I am warned that my time is very brief. Longstreet and others speak of the great conflict that was going on that day, and that he had to send troops by direction of General Lee to the aid of General Jackson. This is shown by the official reports of Longstreet, Hood, and others, including General R. E. Lee.

General Lee, referring to the movements and battle of the 29th of August, in his report says:

The cavalry guarded our right and left flanks, that on the right being under General Stuart in person. After the arrival of Longstreet the enemy changed his position and began to concentrate opposite Jackson's left, opening a brisk artillery fire, which was responded to with effect by some of General A. P. Hill's batteries. Colonel Walton placed a part of his artillery upon a commanding position between Generals Jackson and Longstreet by order of the latter, and engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours. Soon afterward General Stuart reported the approach of a large force from the direction of Bristoe Station threatening Longstreet's right. The brigades under General Wilcox were sent to re-enforce General Jones, but no serious attack was made, and after firing a few shots the enemy withdrew. While this demonstration was being made on our right a large force advanced to assail the left of Jackson's position occupied by the division of General A. P. Hill. The attack was received by his troops with their accustomed steadiness, and the battle raged with great fury. The enemy was repeatedly repulsed but again pressed on the attack with fresh troops. Once he succeeded in penetrating an interval between General Gregg's brigade on the extreme left and that of General Thomas, but was quickly driven back with great slaughter by the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, and the Forty-ninth Georgia, of Thomas's brigade. The contest was close and obstinate; the combatants sometimes delivered their fire at ten paces. General Gregg, who was most exposed, was re-enforced by Hays's brigade under General Forno, and successfully and gallantly resisted the attack of the enemy until, the ammunition of his brigade being exhausted and all its field officers but two killed or wounded, it was relieved, after several hours of severe fighting, by Early's brigade and the Eighth Louisiana Regiment. General Early drove the enemy back with heavy loss and pursued about two hundred yards beyond the line of battle, when he was recalled to the position on the railroad where Thomas, Pender, and Archer had firmly held their ground against every attack. While the battle was raging on Jackson's left General Longstreet ordered Hood and Evans to advance, but before the order could be obeyed Hood was himself attacked and his command at once became warmly engaged. General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left, and one of Kemper's brigades, under Colonel Hunton, moved forward on his right. The enemy was repulsed by Hood after a severe contest, and fell back, closely followed by our troops. The battle continued until 9 p. m., the enemy retreating until he had reached a strong position, which he held with a large force. The darkness of the night put a stop to the engagement.

With these official reports and other indubitable evidence it can not longer be contended that no battle was fought on the 29th of August.

General Grant's whole opinion is based on the erroneous impression that the only battle fought was on the 30th of August. He says in his letter, "I find that the battle was fought on the 30th of August." It is then fair to him to say that with the real facts before him he would have reached the opposite conclusion.

Was Porter justified in failing to obey the order to go into the fight if he had known all that General Lee knew as to the strength of the forces in front of him? The answer certainly must be that he was not justified. I do not think General Porter would have been blameless even if he had had no order to go into that battle. If he had known only what was open and known to every one there, that a great battle was pending, it was his duty to have marched into the conflict with his fellow officers and soldiers.

I might give examples to show that although an officer might probably be repulsed, it would constitute no excuse for his refusal to obey an order. The history of other wars might be referred to to prove this. Marshal McDonald, at Wagram, moved under orders with his devoted fifteen thousand French soldiers upon the Austrian center when it was understood that the battle would turn upon the result, and he came out of it with only fifteen hundred men. But Napoleon won a great victory. He did not say to the great warrior of that day, "I will probably meet with a repulse," and then refuse to obey orders.

In that memorable winter battle in the forest in and around Hohenlinden there was a general officer who had an indefinite order to move by night upon the Austrian flank and rear. He had no summer night to move his troops in; he had no plain road to move upon. He had a dark December night, with a dense forest about him and a driving storm of snow enveloping him, and only a timber road to march upon. He was ordered to move to a position to strike the enemy in the rear, as was Porter on this occasion at Bull Run.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. If I can be allowed ten minutes more I will be through.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I presume there will hardly be another speech to-night; it is now 4 o'clock. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will be allowed to conclude.

Mr. KEIFER. I am very nearly through.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am sure there will be no objection to extending the time on the other side when desired. We have been very liberal up to this time, and I hope that liberality will be continued on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. Consent is asked for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to proceed for ten minutes longer.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. KEIFER. This officer received from Marshal Moreau an order to move to the enemy's rear. He struggled on, through darkness and storm, although he was out of reach of his commanding officer.

He knew nothing of his purposes, or whether he was assailing the Archduke John with his then apparently victorious Austrian hosts in his front or flank or rear. He, however, knew a soldier's duty was to obey. This officer met suddenly at St. Christoph village with a great obstacle, General Riesch's corps of the Austrian army, and he said, "My orders are not to stop to fight here or to fight that corps, but to strike in the rear of the Austrian main army in the defile behind Hohenlinden at Mattenboett." He left a single brigade behind him to engage the whole corps of the Austrians and pushed on through that driving storm, overthrowing the Hungarian horse that appeared in his front, and finally plunged among the artillery and baggage wagons of the enemy and overthrew his rear guard, causing the complete overthrow of that great army and bringing victory again to the French standard. That man was Richepanse. He was no Porter. He did not think that he would probably be repulsed. He had no idea of duty but to obey the orders of his superior officers.

Others have shown as great examples, though differing in circumstances. When the battle of the 14th of June, 1800, on the plains of Marengo, in Italy, was lost, when Napoleon, with many of his best generals and marshals under him, was overthrown and in full retreat, he looked anxiously for the coming of one who had no orders to move to that field, but to another. There was one of his marshals who had been dispatched to a distant point (Novi), away off from the field of battle, as it turned out. But that man was a brave soldier. He had fought upon the sandy plains and under the burning sun of Egypt. He had but recently returned from that theater of war. When the first distant sound of battle came to his ear he halted his column and listened. He put his ear to the earth to catch the sound more clearly; and then without orders he reversed his whole command and moved in hot haste where the sound of battle summoned him. He came up at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and found the French army in full retreat, beaten and overthrown. When consulted by Napoleon as to what should be done in the crisis, casting his eye over the field, he said: "Yes, the battle is lost; but it is only 3 o'clock. There is yet time to gain another." [Applause.] He had not waited for orders, and he now put himself at the head of his devoted six thousand. General Porter had twelve thousand men, according to his own admission and as others say; over thirteen thousand as shown by the reports. But there was Marshal Desaix at the head of his six thousand moving into battle against an army flushed with victory. At 5 o'clock the battle was won; the sun again shone upon the victorious eagles of France [applause]; a victory that produced a vast influence on the destinies of France and the whole world. It gave peace to then republican France, and, a little later, an emperor's crown to Bonaparte. But the great marshal who moved to the sound of the music of battle, who took his orders from the booming echoes of the cannon, was dead! It might have been better for others in history if they had imitated his example and met the same fate. [Applause.]

What was the example of the heroic confederate General Pickett when he went with his devoted division into that charge at Gettysburg? Though unfortunate as to success, it proved the heroism and devotedness of the general who commanded and the troops under him. I might give other illustrations; and they are abundant. Other countries have believed, as our Government did in this case, in having orders obeyed. It has been stated here that the British Government shot Admiral Byng for disobedience of orders; and since that time there have been few in the English navy to disobey the orders of a superior officer. Another memorable case occurred about a century ago in the English navy. Captain Sutton, who was commanding a vessel in the Mediterranean, failed, as was claimed, to obey an order to cut cables and pursue on the high sea a retreating enemy. He was arrested and put in prison, where he was confined two years and seven months before trial. I do not believe the delay in trying him was right. But he brought suit to recover damages for false imprisonment; and I desire to read a single paragraph from a report of the final hearing of the case, giving the well-stated opinion of Lords Mansfield and Loughborough as to what the duty of an English officer is. Certainly an American officer ought to stand upon the same plane. The court in that case said:

A subordinate officer must not judge of the danger, propriety, expediency, or consequences of the order he receives; he must obey. Nothing can excuse him but a physical impossibility. A forlorn hope is devoted—many gallant officers have been devoted. Fleets have been saved and victories obtained by ordering particular ships upon desperate services, with almost a certainty of death or capture. (Sutton vs. Johnston, 1 Durnford & East, 546.)

And for all we know it might have been the opinion of General Pope, rightfully assumed from a soldierly standpoint, that in order to secure victory to the Army as a whole he should put Porter's forces into the conflict even though they were all devoted to death and destruction.

It is pretended by some that it was impossible for Porter, who had fought gallantly on other fields, to have been untrue to his country. Other brave men—a few only, thank God!—have deserted under like circumstances duty and country.

Even after Benedict Arnold had formed the purpose to desert to the English in our Revolution he fought, as he had before, bravely for his country.

Moreau, who reached the high rank, by his valor, of a marshal of France, and who commanded the French at Hohenlinden, died at Dresden fighting with the combined despots of Europe against France.

Now a word as to the bill. It proposes to relieve Fitz-John Porter from the odium of a crime which he justly wears, by authorizing him to be appointed by the President to the position he held "in the Army of the United States of the same grade and rank, together with all the rights, titles, and privileges held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army; and in his (the President's) discretion to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade." The President has already, as an act of pardon in the exercise of his clemency, relieved him from the disability to hold office as fixed in the sentence.

Pardon, which implies guilt and conviction, may often be properly exercised where repentance and contrition have come and future good conduct may be fairly implied. I do not believe we can, in our legislative capacity, reverse any part of the sentence of the court that found Porter guilty. Only the President under the Constitution of the United States can grant pardons after sentences for crimes against United States law. In so far as the sentence is executed it must stand forever.

We may authorize Porter's reappointment to the Army and give him pay out of the United States Treasury, but we can not wipe out his heinous guilt. The blood of the needlessly slain will forever cry out against him from the ground, and he will be branded with the guilty mark of Cain forever.

Some excuse him because they think he was not disloyal to his country, but only to General Pope. There is no distinction. He could not betray his commanding officer without betraying his country. Others say he should be rehabilitated with the right again to hold office with the thousands and tens of thousands of others who once fought against the Union and who are now clothed with full citizenship under the Constitution. There is a marked distinction between him and them. He then assumed loyalty to his country on the field of battle; they did not. He was duly convicted upon lawful trial; they were not. They petitioned for legislative pardon; he for legislative vindication. Such a plea would throw wide open the prison doors all over the land.

Our country has been the most magnanimous of any known in the world's annals toward those who have openly offended against its flag. But it is not, I hope, ready to honor, glorify, and compensate him who failed to do his duty in the supreme hour of battle.

It is said this is a political question. I hope not; though it seems nearly so from indications. The friends of General Porter openly boast of a vindication he is to have at the hands of those who were lately in rebellion. Do they understand military justice better than those who were on the side of the Union? I do not wish to believe the brave men on the other side of this Chamber have more regard for a man who disobeyed the orders of his superior officer on the battlefield than those on this. We shall soon know.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] in charge of this bill has in advance of any favorable action by this House made it impossible for there to be any semblance of vindication by the use of the language following:

There was never such an absurdity perpetrated in any representative body as has been enacted here; for three hundred gentlemen, knowing nothing about military matters, to sit here and gravely discuss subjects about which they know nothing whatever and never can know.

If his opinion of the mental measure of his colleagues is right, then the decision about to be made can command no respect now or hereafter, and the judgment of the court which tried him will be and should be forever looked to by the present and future generations as a just and righteous one. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SLOCUM. At the request of several members of the House, I ask unanimous consent there may be a reprint of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter and of the majority report and the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the two reports be printed together.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be so made.

Mr. SLOCUM. I think the time has now arrived when there should be some understanding in the House about the disposition to be made of this bill. It has been debated for three days. I propose to ask, by unanimous consent, that to-morrow's session be given up to debate only on this question, with the understanding that a week from to-day the previous question shall be ordered and the vote taken.

Mr. CALKINS. In the arrangement do not say no vote shall be taken to-morrow.

Mr. SLOCUM. Very well.

Mr. CALKINS. Members do not wish to address empty benches, and any such understanding will send members off from the House.

Mr. SLOCUM. I will modify my motion, that by unanimous consent to-morrow shall be devoted to debate, and that the vote shall be taken next Friday or sooner, if it be so desired.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Say after the morning hour to-morrow, so as to allow reports from committees to be made.

Mr. SLOCUM. I agree to that.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman from New York consent to this? That debate shall go on to-morrow is satisfactory to us; that on next Friday there shall be one speech on either side, and that then the previous question shall be ordered and the vote taken.

Mr. SLOCUM. I should be glad to do that; and if the House will so order it will relieve me from great embarrassment.

Mr. HORR. We are satisfied.

Mr. SLOCUM. I have a list of twenty gentlemen who desire to speak on this question. I do not wish to be accused of discourtesy to any member. I do not wish to cut off debate. I do not wish that charge brought to my door. Whatever the House will agree to will be acceptable to me. If the matter be disposed of now it will relieve me of great embarrassment.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, I find that there are some gentlemen here who do not consent to my suggestion to limit this debate to the time I named. For my own part I was willing to fix a time for closing the debate. But gentlemen should remember that this very same bill was debated twice in the Senate, once for five solid weeks, and a few days' debate in the House on a measure of this importance would not be unusual. I am willing for one to make some arrangement, but I can not speak for my colleagues.

Mr. STEELE. Suppose at 5 o'clock this evening we take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and then toward the afternoon, when the debate shall have run for some time, we may be able to arrive at some suggestion or conclusion as to the length of debate. I suggest that to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me by a number of gentlemen that this bill is somewhat equivocal in its terms respecting back pay. I ask, therefore, that unanimous consent may be given for the following amendment to the bill:

I move to strike out of the bill the last three words, "appointment under it," and insert "the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The bill is not yet in the House.

Mr. BAYNE. Could not this be allowed by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Only in Committee of the Whole; this bill is yet in the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. My object was, as this bill is to be reprinted, I understand, to have it printed with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to have any proposed amendment printed with the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I ask consent to have the amendment which I have suggested printed with the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SLOCUM. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that no arrangement can be made at this time with reference to length of debate. I ask, therefore, unanimous consent of the House that a session be held to-morrow for the consideration of this bill, to be debated only, no further action to be taken.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that we should have a morning hour.

Mr. SLOCUM. I think I can not yield to that suggestion.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Then I ask leave, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to report a bill to the House from that committee simply for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. SLOCUM. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House shall resume the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter for debate only, no other business to be transacted, except a report from the Committee on Agriculture for printing and recommittal to the committee?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883; and

A bill (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point, Antonio Barrios, of Gautemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to be permitted to print in the RECORD some additional remarks.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. RAY, of New York Mr. Chairman, as a new member of this House I should feel somewhat reluctant to engage in this discussion were it not for the fact that I performed some little service as a private soldier. It will be proper in my judgment for this House to consult the privates as well as the brigadiers. There are several reasons which induce and compel me, acting here as a judge and juror, to support this bill restoring Fitz-John Porter to the Army. They are:

First. The trial of Fitz-John Porter was had at a time when men were more or less moved by passion and prejudice, and when deliberate judgment upon such a subject was not fully exercised.

Second. Most material evidence explanatory of the acts of General Porter, offered in his behalf, was excluded, and illegal evidence damaging in its nature was admitted.

Third. Newly discovered evidence has been placed upon the record, coming from the lips of disinterested witnesses, which in my judgment clearly and satisfactorily shows the absolute innocence of General Porter.

Fourth. This, when taken in connection with the previous record, shows clearly that the court-martial acted under the erroneous impression that no enemy in force was in front of General Porter on the 29th of August, 1862, while it now appears that Longstreet's whole force was there; so that an attack by Porter at that time would have been a "great blunder" and a "great crime."

Fifth. It is also evident that the court acted under the erroneous impression that General Porter not only refused and neglected to fight that day, when he had orders to do so, but that he actually retreated without attacking or being attacked, and at a time when the rest of the Army was engaged in a furious battle two miles to his right; while it now appears beyond any controversy, beyond any possible dispute, that all these assumptions were incorrect, and that his conduct "was subordinate, was judicious," and was loyal and most wise.

Sixth. A military board of inquiry, composed of most loyal and eminent generals of our Army, Generals Schofield, Getty, and Terry, have fully examined into this matter, and while their judgment is not conclusive upon us, yet it is entitled to great weight, and ought to control us. Many of the most eminent and skilled military men of the world, after a careful and patient investigation, have fully concurred in the opinion of that board, as does General U. S. Grant, whose military opinion on this question ought to be regarded. This report fully exonerates General Porter.

Again, it is a rule of law which appeals alike to our judgment and to our love of justice, that in all cases where a reasonable doubt exists an accused party is entitled to the benefit of that doubt. Therefore when we come to consider the questions that are involved in this case we should look at them candidly, fairly, and honestly, throwing aside our preconceived notions, throwing aside all passion, throwing aside all partisanship, and approaching their consideration, ready if a reasonable doubt exists in our minds to give the accused the benefit of that doubt. We are to act on this question, not as Republicans or as Democrats, but as fair, intelligent judges of law and fact.

I would call attention to one or two questions that have been asked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. I desire to answer them. It seems to me that the record in this case furnishes the most ample and the most conclusive answer. If the record before this House furnishes no answer, if the gentleman will turn to any military history or any military record of the war of the rebellion he will find those questions answered beyond all cavil.

The gentleman asks us why it was that McClellan wrote the letter to General Porter asking him to give every aid to General Pope? I can tell him, and he knows full well why it was. It is a matter of history that for twenty long years has not been contradicted. General McClellan wrote that letter at the request of Lincoln, and because General Pope, in order to excuse his own blunders, his own ignorance, and his own incompetency, after having been guilty of a series of the most egregious blunders that ever disgraced the military annals of this or any other country, had aimed the shafts of slander at General Porter, and had thus sought to evade the responsibility of the failures of that campaign. That is the verdict of history, and it is the verdict of the people of this country with very few exceptions.

I desire to answer another proposition that was advanced by the gentleman from Ohio. He read from the report of the proceedings of this board of inquiry what was said when the subject was under discussion as to what evidence should be taken into consideration. He said in substance and charged that this board of inquiry admitted anything, admitted everything in the shape of evidence. He said in substance that they took into consideration not only legal evidence but all that had been said on the street-corners, in the byways, and among the hedges. uch is not the record. As the gentleman went along he said, "Now we will skip." When he reads the record my gallant friend from Ohio should not "skip" the material parts of it. If he reads a part, he should read the whole relating to the point he criticises.

I call the attention of the House to the question that was under consideration when the members of the board made use of the language which the gentleman read. Colonel Smith, Captain Pope, and Duffee had been called as witnesses before the court-martial. All of them had given evidence more or less to the disadvantage of General Porter. After that trial had closed, after the court-martial had shut its doors, after that most unjust and most unrighteous verdict had been pronounced, this Colonel Smith, this Captain Pope, and this man Duffee, each of them, had made declarations and statements in contradiction of what they testified to before that court, and Captain Pope confessed he lost his way when he went to deliver the 4.30 order and did not deliver it till about dusk. When the question came up before this board of inquiry as to whether or not those declarations should be admitted, this board of inquiry made use of the language that the gentleman read. I appeal to the conscience, to the common sense, to the legal knowledge of every lawyer upon the floor of this House and ask them to say whether or not that ruling was not most just, most wise and proper, and whether it was not in strict accordance with the rules of law and evidence? I pause for an answer.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Without having called the witnesses and examined them in regard to the conversations and the time and place? I do not know how the law is in New York.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Yes, sir, under the circumstances. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will simply say that I have been practicing law for some years in Indiana, and that is not the law there.

Mr. RAY, of New York. The witnesses had been sworn; they had given their testimony before the court-martial; it had been reduced to writing, and was a matter of record in the War Department of this great country, and was then before the board. And when this board of inquiry was appointed to ascertain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, they had the right to ascertain whether or not the witnesses upon whose testimony General Porter had been convicted were false or true, were perjurers or truthful men.

But I will give you another answer. Each and every one of these witnesses was called and sworn before the board of inquiry. Attention was called to the contradictions, &c., and they were called in to explain, admit, or deny, and if you will take the trouble to read the record you will find that I am correct.

Mr. STEELE. Can you show any authority by which that board was clothed with the power to administer an oath?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Yes, sir; to cause it to be done.

Mr. STEELE. I defy you to do it. I defy you to show that they were clothed with judicial functions, or that they had any right whatever under the law to administer an oath.

Mr. RAY, of New York. The board did not administer oaths or assume to. An officer authorized by law to administer oaths was called in to perform that duty, and it imposed all the obligations of an oath and the penalties for perjury.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that if I stop to answer the questions of these gentlemen, which I shall be most pleased to do, the question of each and every one of them, any question which any person can ask in regard to this case, I must have an extension of time.

I have read every word of the evidence in this case over and over again. I have studied all the orders, because ten years ago, like many others, I was groping in the dark, I was blind and would not see. When the truth began to come out and I got a little glimmering of light ten years ago (having then lived ten years in the dark, believing that General Porter was guilty), I began to investigate the matter. As I began to read I began to see my error. It is with the greater pleasure, therefore, that I stand here to defend General Porter and to ask justice for him at the hands of this House. [Applause.]

Perhaps I may transcend some of the rules of debate, but that makes no difference. I think I have the case in my head, and I know that I have it in my heart. [Renewed applause.]

I therefore say again that if the gentlemen will agree to have my time extended to-morrow, when I shall again take the floor, it will be with the greatest pleasure that I shall answer every question that they may ask me.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to say to my distinguished friend that I would not have interrupted him had I not understood that he invited an interruption.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I did yours, but I did not invite the question of the other gentleman.

When the gentleman asks me if this board had any right to take a judicial oath and to impose upon its witnesses any judicial responsibility, I say no. Neither did the originial court-martial act judicially. A court-martial is no part of the judicial system of this Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is a mistake.

Mr. RAY, of New York. It is a mistake, you say. I invite your attention to the Constitution of the United States where the length and breadth of the judicial powers of this Government are fully described and pointed out, and if anywhere therein you can find that the proceedings of a court-martial come within those powers, then I will yield to the argument.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but will he tell us what body acts judicially in the Army?

Mr. RAY, of New York. A court-martial.

Mr. HORR. Oh?

Mr. RAY, of New York. But I say it is no part of the judicial system of this Government.

Mr. HORR. You say they do not act judicially. How do they act?

Mr. RAY, of New York. A court-martial acts in the same way that this House acts when it lays down its rules for its government; in the same way that this House acts when through its Speaker or its chairman it enforces those rules. I ask the gentleman if he will tell me that our chairman in enforcing the rules of this House acts as a judge? Does this House in saying whether or not the Speaker decides correctly or incorrectly act in a judicial capacity? I ask him that question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him one moment?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I will.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman says that courts-martial are no part of the constitutional judicial system of this country. Article 3, section 1, of the Constitution reads as follows:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Corut, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Now, courts-martial have been established by the Congress of the United States, and they are the only courts that are known to the land and naval forces of the United States.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If the gentleman will read right along he will find that the same Constitution says that the proceedings of every court within that definition shall be subject to the appellate powers of the court, and may be reviewed in the higher courts. I ask the gentleman, in answer to his proposition, whether or not he ever heard of there being any appellate power applicable to a court-martial?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Because a general court-martial, when its sentence is approved by the President of the United States, is itself a supreme court so far as the land and naval forces are concerned, and there is no superior to it.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Well, I have no time to stop to argue that question with the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I hope the gentleman from New York will be permitted to proceed with his argument without being interrupted with questions which he is not willing to have put.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then the gentleman should not invite questions.

Mr. RAY, of New York. And he has not invited but one.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is interrupting the gentleman occupying the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to a recent decision of the Supreme Court in Mason's case, where they sustained the position that such a court is a part of the judicial system.

Mr. RAY, of New York. They sustained the legality of the court, because it was ordained by an act of Congress; but that is very far from establishing the position that it is a part of the judicial system of the Government. That is the point.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If such a court is not a part of the judicial system, what judicial system is there for the entire land and naval forces of the United States? That is what I want to know.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I suppose the gentleman would contend that because we have an Army in times of war——

Mr. CUTCHEON. And in times of peace.

Mr. RAY, of New York. And in times of peace, that therefore the rules and regulations controlling the Army are a part of the judicial system. I deny it. I say there are no decisions to that effect. But I can not stop here to dispute with the gentleman, and I do not care to do so.

There is one other thing to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention. He asked the question why it was that when McDowell and Porter were there in front of the rebel army on the road to Gainesville Porter did not extend by the right flank and thus connect with Reynolds away over on the left of Pope's army? If the gentleman had read history, if he had studied military law, if he had advised with military men, I think he would have found his own answer. Here is the answer to which I call the gentleman's attention: General McDowell and General Porter that morning rode out in that direction as far as and across the railroad, and after proceeding some distance over the railroad some one came to them and said: "You can not get through there." They then turned back; and McDowell took fifteen thousand of those troops and marched to the rear by a circuitous route, and did not reach the front again with his troops—did not reach Pope—until 4 or 5 o'clock. Will any gentleman dispute that? Now I ask the gentleman whether it was not as feasible and proper for McDowell with his fifteen thousand men to march up through the woods to his right, and thus connect with Reynolds, as it would have been for Porter to have done so two or three hours later in the face of the enemy?

I will ask the gentleman another question. Is it not a well established rule of military law that a military commander, with a force under him, should never attempt to make a flank march within reach of the enemy's guns on broken ground and in their immediate front? I ask him whether it has not been laid down that such a movement as that always has been and always must be destructive to the army?

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Well, I will say it is.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. That settles it!

Mr. RAY, of New York. The gentleman may say "that settles it;" but if he will read the best military authorities, he will find that I am right and he is wrong, and that settled law "settles it." He will find himself in the same position occupied by the gentleman from the State of Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], who stated to us that all these questions of obedience or disobedience to military orders are regulated by statute, and that there is no statute saying that a military commander, when not under the eye of his superior, may exercise a discretion as to the time and mode of executing an order, and that, therefore, no such rule exists. I will meet that further on.

But I must hasten on to the consideration of the questions in this case more directly.

> Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies among his worshipers.

In the case of Fitz-John Porter for nearly seventeen years the truth lay crushed, although gradually dawning upon the public mind. At last there came an investigation, a report, and a vindication.

Now to come to the history of this case. You will recollect, Mr. Chairman, that the charges were preferred against General Porter on the 28th day of November, 1862, nearly three months after the scenes of the 29th and 30th days of August, 1862. And I desire to ask the gentlemen, some of them, and they can answer the inquiry at some future time, not now, why it was that for three long months the Department at Washington was idle and said nothing about these charges? Why was it after the Union army fell back from Bull Run, after that disastrous campaign had ended, that they placed General Porter in supreme command of the defenses of Washington? Why was it that they ordered him with his corps to Antietam? Why was it that for nearly three long months no charges were preferred and no action taken? And why was it he was not removed until after the removal of General McClellan? I ask gentlemen to tell me at some other time than now whether there was any connection between those two acts?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman from New York——

Mr. RAY, of New York. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. HORR. Charges were preferred within six days.

Mr. RAY, of New York. No.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me say——

Mr. RAY, of New York. When I am asked a question let me answer it.

A MEMBER. Charges were preferred on the 6th of September, 1862.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I say that the charges were not preferred on the 6th day of September, nor on any other day in the month of September.

When General Pope by his letters from the field filled the public mind with the whisperings of scandal and falsehood, General Porter, like the soldier he was—noble, true, brave, patriotic; a man who from his very boyhood had fearlessly faced the enemy on the battle-fields of Mexico and at Gaines's Mill and in the sanguinary battles before Richmond, still begrimed with the smoke of the enemy's guns—went to the President of the United States and begged and implored of him that a board of inquiry should be appointed and examine into his conduct and enable him to show whether or not he was guilty. Was it granted? No.

Mr. HORR. Yes.

Mr. RAY, of New York. No.

Mr. HORR. Yes.

Mr. RAY, of New York. No. [Applause and laughter.] A military commission was appointed, but dissolved. While Porter clamored for a hearing, while he clamored to make his defense, General Pope and his satellites were trying to conceal their own blunders by poisoning the mind of the Secretary of War and by poisoning the mind of the President of the United States. And the result was that when they thought they had sufficiently poisoned their minds, when they found the Government had determined to remove General McClellan, when they found that was done, then it was, and not till then, this court-martial was ordered, November 25, 1862; then it was that the charges were preferred, and then it was that the court-martial was ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Yes, sir; if it be a brief one.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will you please state where you got the evidence that General Pope was poisoning the mind of the President?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Yes, give him time to tell us.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Gentlemen, I presume you assume that I am asserting but not proving it. Well, if you will give me time I will read from the records of this Congress—from the records of the Senate and of this House—to prove it beyond all controversy.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Not from speeches?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Not from any speeches, sir, but from the official records I have here before me as contained in your reports and public documents.

Take the report that he (General Pope) sent down from the front, and in which he undertook to censure General Porter; and I ask you if there is not evidence there of an effort on his part to poison the public mind?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I say, no.

Mr. RAY, of New York. And I say there is.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask that he have as much time as he wants to read that report, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I think I will read it to you, but not now. In the morning I will do so if you will be here to hear it read.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman shall have ample opportunity, and I hope his time will be extended for that purpose.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I move that the committee now rise

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SLOCUM. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Very well.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from New York of course retaining the floor.

Tne CHAIRMAN. Certainly; the gentleman from New York is entitled to twenty-three minutes longer.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no resolusion thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following business was transacted:

STAR-ROUTE PROSECUTIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, acknowledging the receipt of the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 17, requesting copies of all correspondence with the Department of Justice touching the prosecution of persons charged with fraud in connection with the star-route mail service; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting the following reports; which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

1. Offers accepted and contracts awarded for carrying the mails under advertisements of October 16, 1882, January 15 and March 1, 1883;

2. Report showing the land and water mails established during the year ending June 30, 1883, other than those let by contract at the annual letting;

3. All allowances made to contractors during the fiscal year 1883 above the sums originally stipulated; and

4. Report of curtailments in the service and pay of contractors.

PRESENTS, ETC., TO NAVAL OFFICERS BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to House resolution of January 15, 1884, in regard to presents, decorations, &c., to officers of the Navy by foreign governments; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMAINS OF GENERAL ORD.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill No. 1256, authorizing the Secretary of War to bring home the body of the late General Ord, for present consideration.

Mr. STEELE. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, of the United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, to be transported from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C., and to pay the necessary expense of such transportation and of the interment of the remains out of the appropriation for contingencies of the Army.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then the motion of Mr. CASSIDY was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 26, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY, ETC.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 876, a bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The House ordered yesterday that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-day the House in Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, for debate only, no other business to be transacted except a report from the Committee on Agriculture for printing and recommittal to the committee.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. If not in violation of the order of the House, I should like to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House no business can be transacted except that which the Chair has just stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 22) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President;

A bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for Alaska;

A bill (S. 258) donating a part of the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Ark., to the city of Fort Smith, for the use and benefit of the free public schools thereof, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 621) for the relief of William L. White.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presents to the House the certificate of election of Francis W. Rockwell, Representative-elect from the State of Massachusetts, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

To the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to all persons to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that on the 17th day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, Francis W. Rockwell, of Pittsfield, in Congressional district No. 12, was regularly and duly chosen by the qualified voters of said district to be a Representative of this Commonwealth therefor in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States for the remainder of the term of two years beginning on the 4th day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, being the Forty-eighth Federal Congress, in accordance with the constitution and laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and of the United States, to fill the trust made vacant by the resignation of George D. Robinson, of Chicopee, thereto duly chosen; and that he, the said Francis W. Rockwell, has been for said district only so elected.

In witness whereof I, George D. Robinson, governor, have hereto set my hand and caused the seal of the Commonwealth to be affixed on this 23d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and eighth.

[SEAL.] GEO. D. ROBINSON.

By his excellency the governor:
HENRY B. PIERCE,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ROCKWELL (presented by Mr. RICE) appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is entitled to the floor. There remain of the gentleman's time twenty-three minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the gentleman from New York resumes his remarks this morning I would like to have the House extend to him the courtesy which was extended to other gentlemen yesterday, and let him complete his remarks, as he was interrupted yesterday a good deal. How much additional time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I should like to have about an hour this morning.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended so as to cover a full hour this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] be entitled to one hour this morning.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I promised yesterday at the close of the remarks I was then making to read to-day something that should show that soon after the close of the battle of the 30th of August General Pope poisoned the mind of the War Department against General Porter. In pursuance of that promise I now desire to read the following from the dispatch of General Pope, written to General Halleck at the close of the battle of the 29th, so far as there was a battle, and also others following on the 30th and 31st, and leave the gentlemen to consider them:

HEADQUARTERS,
Battle near Groveton, Va., 30th—5 a. m.

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until dark, by which time the enemy was driven from the field, which we now occupy. * * * The news just reaches me from the front that the enemy is retiring toward the mountains. I go forward at once to see. We have made great captures, but I am not able yet to form an idea of their extent. Our troops behaved splendidly. * * *

JOHN POPE, Major-General.

Major-General HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

This was written early in the morning after the battle of the 29th, and in it we search in vain for any complaint against Porter. Pope then supposed himself victorious. Porter arrived on the ground in pursuance of orders early that morning (30th), and then Pope issued an order for the pursuit of the enemy. The order was dated at 12 o'clock noon, and contains the following:

The following forces will be immediately thrown forward in pursuit of the enemy and press him vigorously during the whole day. Major-General McDowell is assigned to the command of the pursuit.

Major-General Porter's corps will push forward on the Warrenton turnpike, followed by the divisions of Brigadier-Generals King and Reynolds.

It will be seen that at noon of the 30th General Pope, with full knowledge of the facts of the day before, assigned Porter to the post of honor, the advance in the pursuit of the enemy, who he supposed were retreating. And in his dispatches to the Government you will search in vain for any criticism on the conduct of Porter.

The enemy, instead of being in full retreat, were ready for an attack, and when our troops moved forward in what Pope supposed was to be the pursuit of a defeated and fleeing enemy, this enemy met them, repulsed them, and drove them from the field.

Of the heroic conduct of General Porter on that day (30th) I need not speak. He attacked the enemy again and again, only to be hurled back, but never in disorder. When the enemy advanced, it was Porter and his brave troops that met the onset and checked the wild attack, and hurled back a confident foe as the granite sea-beat rocks hurl back and break the insweeping billows.

Now, after this brave and heroic conduct of General Porter that day, but after the boast of Pope had been shown false by a defeat of the army, what did Pope do? Commend Porter for his gallant conduct on that day? No, sir; but he penned and sent to Washington the following malicious and false statement, and as I believe for the express purpose of covering and distracting attention from his own errors:

CENTREVILLE, September 1—8.50 p. m.

* * * One commander of a corps who was ordered to march from Manassas Junction to join me near Groveton, although he was only five miles distant, failed to get up at all; worse still, fell back to Manassas without a fight, and in plain hearing, at less than three miles' distance, of a furious battle which raged all day. It was only in consequence of peremptory orders that he joined me the next day. One of his brigades, the brigadier-general of which professed to be looking for his division, absolutely remained all day at Centreville in plain view of the battle, and made no attempt to join. What renders the whole matter worse, these are both officers of the regular Army, who do not hold back from ignorance or fear. Their constant talk, indulged in publicly and in promiscuous company, is that the Army of the Potomac will not fight; that they are demoralized by the withdrawal from the Peninsula, &c.

Now, sir, Porter did get up that afternoon on his route to Gainesville, to which place the joint order directed him to march. It did not direct him to march to Groveton or to join Pope near there. He met the enemy and engaged him, and only desisted from battle at the command of his superior officer, McDowell, who told him he was too far out, and that that was no place to fight a battle. He did not fall back to Manassas, but remained all night in the face of Longstreet, and marched to Groveton pursuant to orders. And, sir, where is the proof that in public and promiscuous company he ever said that the Army of the Potomac would not fight or that they were demoralized? The evidence is the other way. And, sir, no man of the Army of the Potomac ever refused to fight.

The thousands of the slain who repose on the yonder heights of Arlington and the legions whose bones strew the fields on every rod of ground from the Potomac to the James give the lie to the assertion. No braver, no truer, no more devoted army ever marched to the field or braved the perils of death. This that I have read was but the beginning of the series of slanders and aspersions to which I have referred.

The object and the animus is found when we peruse General Pope's evidence given before the Committee on the Conduct of the War. Here it is:

In the last of January, 1863, when the trial of Fitz-John Porter had closed and his guilt had been established, I intimated to the President that it seemed a proper time for some acknowledgment of my services in Virginia.

Ah, gentlemen, having done his work, he sought his reward. To the credit and praise of the noble and immortal Lincoln be it said there was no reward given. Sir, we may safely say that in the mind of that noble man there dawned a bright light when Pope so far forgot himself as to make the degradation of a fellow-soldier the occasion for demanding a reward at the hands of this great Government.

Gentlemen having sought to make a point that the decision of the board of inquiry ought not to be regarded because the board itself was not authorized to administer oaths, I desire to call attention to the fact that the board did have power to cause oaths to be administered by an officer duly commissioned and authorized so to do, thereby imposing on the witness all the obligations of an oath and all the pains and penalties of perjury. By turning to pages 5 and 6 of the record of that board gentlemen will find that course was decided upon and pursued. I regard it a complete answer to the point taken. It is eminently satisfactory to my own mind. The President had power under the law to appoint the board, being commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces of the United States, and it then became a proceeding under and by authority of law.

These witnesses having taken an oath in that proceeding, which was administered by a proper officer, duly authorized to administer oaths, it seems hardly worth while to argue that the witnesses were not obligated to tell the truth. But inasmuch as the only witnesses before that board who were suspected of perjury were Dyer, Pope, and Smith, and General Porter did not see fit to prosecute them in the criminal courts, it is hardly a practical question.

But, sir, let me resume, or rather commence, the consideration of this case in some regular order, and if possible let me proceed without so much interruption. After four years of war and anxiety, of bloodshed and tears, there came a final victory, and the boys came tramping home again, and when gentle peace once more smiled all over this broad land, and the cannon's roar, musketry's crash, and the bugle's blast no longer troubled the air, there came hours for thought, deliberation, and meditation. Removed from these scenes by twenty years of time, truth appears.

The eternal years of God are hers!

I regret exceedingly that an attempt should be made to draw party lines on this question. There is no party or politics in it. It is a personal matter, relating solely to the question of the guilt or innocence of Fitz-John Porter. Upon the determination of that question, and that alone, should the vote of the members of this House depend. Under our oaths, the Constitution, and in the eye of the Supreme Judge of the Universe, to whom we should all pray for guidance and wisdom, we are bound to approach the investigation of this case dispassionately, seriously, and without bias. We must forget party and remember that we are acting as judges. To my conscience and my God, loving my country and her honor, proud of her past and confident of her future, shall I answer for my decision.

Until a few days since, in this House, I never saw Fitz-John Porter. During the war, and for several years, I supposed him guilty; then the study of history, a reading of the case, and the appeals of the soldiers in his behalf changed my opinion, and that has ripened into a settled conviction Sitting in the galleries of the United States Senate I listened with the deepest interest to the argument of the brave and sturdy Senator from Illinois. He failed to shake my opinion; he chained my conviction of the innocence of Fitz-John Porter to the rock of eternal faith.

The charges against General Porter, then a major-general, recently appointed by President Lincoln without any solicitation on his part for most marked and distinguished services before Richmond, were preferred by General B. S. Roberts, a member of General Pope's staff, in November, 1862. The order convening the court was made November 25, 1862. His trial commenced in December following. The trial closed by the presentation of the argument for the defense on the 10th day of January, 1863.

The judge-advocate declined to present any argument in reply, having been present at all the deliberations of the court, and immediately the court was cleared, and within three hours the accused was pronounced "guilty."

January 13 the proceedings were transmitted to the Secretary of War. As to whether or not they were ever transmitted to the President of the United States, and if so when, the record fails to show, but they were approved and confirmed under date of January 21, 1863.

The review of the case presented to the President was most prejudiced and unfair, in my judgment. It suppressed evidence for the accused and colored that against him.

In the midst of the trial, in the dead of winter, and when no military operations were on foot, the following order was sent to the court:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 5, 1863.

GENERAL: The state of the service imperatively demands that the proceedings in the court over which you are now presiding, having been pending more than four weeks, should be brought to a close without unnecessary delay.

You are, therefore, directed to sit without regard to hours, and close your proceedings as speedily as may be consistent with justice and the public service.

Yours truly,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Major-General HUNTER,
President, &c.

Comment is unnecessary. It was a court acting under orders. From that time forward General Porter constantly knocked at the doors of this Government for a rehearing, the presentation of new evidence, a full and complete examination.

Joining with him in this demand for such a rehearing were many distinguished citizens.

April 12, 1878, President Hayes appointed a board of inquiry, consisting of Generals J. M. Schofield, A. H. Terry, and G. W. Getty, all of whom had served with honor and distinction in the war of the rebellion. Excluding Generals Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, they constitute the highest and best military authority in the country. Two of them had expressed themselves as violently prejudiced against General Porter. Yet, after a full and careful hearing and a patient examination, in which the Government was most ably represented, a unanimous report was made by that board fully exonerating General Porter, and in conclusion they say:

In our opinion justice requires at his hands (the President's) such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the position of which that sentence deprived him.

The President, being without power to act, remitted the proceedings to Congress.

General James A. Garfield, lately the loved and honored President of the United States, introduced the first measure into Congress looking to the relief of Major-General Porter. While it has been asserted that he was still convinced of his guilt, I for one too much respect and love and honor his memory for one moment to entertain that or any such belief.

General Grant after a full and patient investigation fully concurred with the board of inquiry. Of his military skill and judgment no person entertains a doubt, unless it be the vainglorious demagogue whose vanity blinds his mental vision. If any argument against General Porter shall be claimed based on the fact that the court-martial proceedings were confirmed by President Lincoln, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that Governor Newell, of New Jersey (page 294), testified:

Mr. Lincoln stated that he had not been able to give the personal attention to the case which its merits required; that he had accepted the opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General and of the War Department as the basis of his action; that if any new evidence exculpatory of General Porter could be introduced he would be very glad to give him an opportunity to have it presented; that he had had a high regard for General Porter personally and as a soldier; and that he hoped he would be able to vindicate himself in that way.

Sir, the fact that the decision of President Lincoln was based upon an error and a misconception of the facts as they existed is most fully shown by the testimony of his son, now Secretary of War. He says in substance that his father was strong in his condemnation of General Porter, and said that the case would have justified a sentence of death; that his father read to him the letter written by General Porter on the evening of the 29th of August, in which he stated that he was "going to retire," and was very strong in his condemnation of it.

Question. I ask you whether you inferred from his language at that time that your father believed that General Porter had done what is intimated in that letter as his intention?

Answer. I should say yes.

It will be remembered that the gravamen of the charge of which General Porter was found guilty was that he "did fail all day to bring it (his corps) on the field, and did shamefully fall back and retreat from the advance of the enemy without any attempt to give them battle;" also, "and did shamefully retreat away and fall back with his army," &c. Now, sir, when it is proved beyond all controversy that General Porter took his army into the immediate presence of a largely superior force and held it there all day; that he advanced his skirmishers, posted his artillery, and commenced a battle, and desisted at the command of his lawful superior, who told him he was "too far out," and that that was "no place to fight a battle;" that the same superior officer took from him at that time King's division, which Pope had ordered to his command for the day, and also took away in all fifteen thousand men ordered to act in conjunction and concert with Porter that day on that same road; that General Porter did not retreat or fall back at all, but on the other hand twice ordered an attack, and was only prevented by the darkness from engaging in battle as soon as ordered so to do; and that he remained in the immediate presence of the enemy all that night and until ordered away by General Pope, we see clearly the error not only of the court-martial but of the President, and we must see as clearly the monstrous wrong done General Porter. That our courts-martial in time of war were not so near to perfection as gentlemen would have us think is well attested by the unanimous report of this same committee in the case of Myron E. Dunlap (Report No. 50, to accompany H. R. 1389), and to which report I refer. They adopt the report of the Forty-seventh Congress, which says, speaking of the judgment of the court-martial in that case:

It lacks such a judgment, lacks all the essentials of validity, and amounts to little more than a stain upon the military record of the party convicted.

They unanimously say that Congress has the power and the right to remove such a judgment.

Of General Marshall, who was a principal witness for General Porter on his trial, and whose evidence was then utterly ignored, they say: "General Marshall, whose brilliant military record and high character entitle whatever he may say to the highest consideration," &c.

Ah, gentlemen of the minority, it comes with poor grace to stand here and defend the alleged justice and infallibility of that court-martial system which you yourselves impeach.

Sir, the same judgment that was unanimously pronounced in the Dunlap case by our respected committee should have been pronounced in the Fitz-John Porter case:

It lacks all the essentials of validity, and amounts to little more than a stain upon the military record of the party convicted.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Yes, sir; although I would rather proceed without interruption.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that in the case of Myron E. Dunlap the whole examination was ex parte, and that the defendant never appeared to vindicate himself at all?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I know it was a trial before a court-martial; and I know this committee unanimously say a most flagrant wrong and outrage were committed, and therefore I say it is with poor grace the committee come here and say, some of them, on the floor of this House, that the judgment of the court-martial in the Fitz-John Porter case should not be corrected or questioned by this Congress.

Mr. BRUMM. Was that the same court-martial that tried Fitz-John Porter?

Mr. RAY, of New York. No, sir; I am speaking of the court-martial system. I say all courts-martial are presumed to be honest and fair and to proceed justly.

The gentleman from Michigan talked long and very loud of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of our Government and of the untold dangers of allowing the legislative body to trespass upon the prerogatives of the judicial. He argues that the court-martial is a part of the judicial branch of our Government. Sir, I was in the war. It was my fortune to march under the gallant and dashing Sheridan, in Emory's corps, Dwight's division, and the brigade finally commanded by the old veteran General Beale, of Maine; for nine months I shared his tents, was under his eye, drew his orders; and from service under those men I gained some knowledge of military life; I gained some knowledge of military law; I became familiar with courts-martial. Since that time I have been actively engaged in the practice of the law in the civil and criminal courts of the State and of the United States. Sir, I have both prosecuted and defended men for every crime known to man; I have studied the Constitution and the statutes, but now for the first time I am told that a court-martial is a part of the judicial system of our country. I now for the first time learn that the rights and liberties of the people are in danger because the Congress of the United States, the immediate representatives of the people, seeks to reverse the finding of a court-martial, the most arbitrary body of men that ever has assembled or ever can assemble.

The point that I was making yesterday in regard to the judicial status of a court-martial was not that it does not perform quasi-judicial functions authorized by Congress, but that they are not courts named in the Constitution. They are authorized by the act establishing the Army Regulations, and hence, being created by Congress, are subject to the control of Congress, which has the right to annul their proceedings, while I contend that in the case of the Supreme Court it would be unconstitutional for Congress to pass any act setting aside its judgment or decree. In this sense and to this extent I assert that courts-martial form no part of the constitutional judicial system of this country. Their jurisdiction extends simply to violations of the military law.

Sir, I suppose a court-martial to be a necessary adjunct of the army, a means provided for the enforcement of military discipline, but I assert that it forms no part of the judicial system of the government of this or of any other country. From its decision there is no appeal, and for its errors there is no court of correction. In it and about it there is no law but the arbitrary will of its members.

Sir, I have no fear for the future of this country as long as Congress may protect its citizens against the arbitrary judgments and decrees of military courts; but if the day ever comes when it is denied that right, farewell to life, liberty, or the pursuit of happiness.

Sir, when this Congress shall be deprived of the power to protect and relieve its citizens from outrage and wrong perpetrated by military tribunals, whether "august," as the gentleman from Michigan terms them, or December and January, acting under orders from the Secretary of War, as was the court that tried and most unjustly convicted Fitz-John Porter, then farewell to the boasted pride and glory of free institutions.

If the civil is to surrender to the military, if nine of our brigadier-generals are superior to the decrees of the fifty millions of our people directly represented in Congress, then haul down the Stars and Stripes, tear up the Constitution, and proclaim the cannon king. Sir, our army courts-martial derive their power directly from Congress; to Congress must they respond.

Sir, the gentleman forgot himself, as he did when he proclaimed that Fitz-John Porter was "guilty" because, forsooth, he obeyed not the mandate of a specter. Still more was I surprised when I learned from the gentleman from Ohio that Napoleon knew nothing of military law, when I learned that all these questions are regulated by statute, and that because, forsooth, there is no statute giving a general in the field a discretion as to the time and mode of obeying an order when not under the eye of his superior, therefore no such law exists.

Sir, there is the statute law and the common law, and there is the military code and the common law of military life; and there is no statute that is in derogation of the great rule practiced by Alexander and Cæsar, laid down by Bonaparte, and followed by Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Rosecrans, Slocum, and Fitz-John Porter. That rule is:

A military order requires passive obedience only when it is given by a superior who is present on the spot at the moment when he gives it. Having then knowledge of the state of things, he can listen to objections and give the necessary explanations to him who is to execute the order.

Says the Duke of Wellington:

It may frequently happen that an officer receives an order which, through circumstances unknown at the moment of giving it by him who gave it, is impossible to execute, or the execution of which would be so difficult or so dangerous that there would be a moral impossibility to conform to it. In a case of this nature Major-General Wellesley would be very far from wishing to prevent detached officers from acting freely.

ARTHUR WELLESLEY.
(Depuis Duc de Wellington.)

Says the Archduke Charles, in speaking of such a situation:

Wartensleben had the right not to execute it; the Archduke Charles, then near Pforzheim, did not know his situation when he gave him the order.

More than twenty years have passed since Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter was thus court-martialed, dismissed the service of the United States, and forever disqualified from holding any office thereunder.

The country was then laboring under a high degree of excitement; the one-half was arrayed in arms against the other half, and the reputation of no man, whether in or out of the military service, was safe from the breath of suspicion. Men of character and ability were put in high place the one day only to be removed and disgraced the next. That general was fortunate indeed who was spared the command of an army during the first year of the war of the rebellion. Even Grant and Sherman, who afterward led our armies to final and complete victory, were traduced in public and private circles and through the public press. Grant was published as a drunkard, and, almost with the sanction of the Government, Sherman was proclaimed "a lunatic." We are told that the South would not, could not, dare not fight. The rebellion was to be crushed in thirty days, and the cry "On to Richmond" rang through the land.

The Bull Run disaster in July, 1861, was charged as the result of cowardice and mismanagement, and it was openly stated that the Union army ran away from a beaten and discomfited confederate army.

The army headquarters were surrounded with eager correspondents, who published to the world the anticipated movement of troops, and every country editor resolved himself into a commanding general or a committee on the conduct of the war. Brilliant and successful battles were fought in the newspapers and the public bar-rooms, and advice and counsel flowed freely from men who never saw a battle even "afar off." All this criticism and distrust was intensified when, in the spring of 1862, the army of General McClellan was repulsed before Richmond and that brave general, instead of being upheld by the strong arm of the Government, was left with the best army of the nineteenth century unsupported on the banks of the James.

On the 26th of June, 1862, Major-General John Pope, an officer who had won distinction in the Mexican war and at Island No. 10, on the Mississippi River, was assigned to the command of the Army of Virginia, an army of about 43,000 men, and late in July he took the field and advanced toward Richmond.

On the 14th of July it had been the misfortune of General Pope to issue an address to his army, in which, after contrasting the armies of the East with those of the West, and to the disadvantage of the former, he proceeded as follows:

Meantime I desire you to dismiss from your minds certain phrases which I am sorry to find much in vogue among you. * * * I hear constantly of taking strong positions and holding them, of lines of retreat and of bases of supplies. Let us discard such ideas. * * * Let us study the probable lines of retreat of our opponents, and leave our own to take care of themselves. Let us look before us, and not behind. Success and glory are in the advance. Disaster and shame lurk in the rear.

This sounded well on paper, but it worked badly in practice. Within the next forty days General Pope found not only "shame and disaster" lurking in the "rear," but Stonewall Jackson, with the flower of the confederate army. He had no base of supplies to hear about, for Jackson held the "base" and his army was in full possession and enjoyment of the "supplies."

Pope must have been astounded when he learned on the morning of the 27th of August that Jackson was in his rear, and that the supplies of his army had been captured or destroyed. But he did what he could to retrieve the disaster, and the active and wily Jackson having slipped away, the army was concentrated, or ordered to concentrate, at Bristoe.

Porter, with his corps, was at Warrenton Junction, and on the evening of the 27th General Pope sent him a written order to move that night, or rather at 1 a. m. on the morning of the 28th, to Bristoe Station, so as to be there by daylight of the 28th. He announced in the order that Hooker had had a severe action with the enemy, who had been driven back, and that the enemy was retiring along the railroad. Haste was urged, not on the ground that the army was in any danger, nor that a battle was imminent, but for the purpose of following a retreating enemy and clearing the country between Manassas and Gainesville.

ORDER FOR NIGHT MARCH.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA.
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night, and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
Warrenton Junction.

This order reached Porter about 10 o'clock the night of the 27th, the messenger having been over three hours on the way, a distance of ten or twelve miles. Porter's army was worn out with constant and hard marching and want of supplies. The night was dark, moonless, and the sky overcast. It rained some during the night. The road to Bristoe was narrow, choked with the trains of the army, cut with narrow streams, unbridged, and upon the railroad track, along which the army might have moved, trains were running all night, making it impossible to move in that way. The evidence shows beyond the shadow of dispute that the narrow dirt roads were full of moving wagons all night, and even the next morning it was impossible to move with any celerity on account of these obstructions.

Upon the receipt of that order Porter showed it or read it to his generals, and said that it "must be obeyed." They (Generals Morell, Sykes, and Butterfield) urged the impossibility of carrying out the order at the hour specified, and pointed out the reasons that made a delay not only judicious but wise and necessary. Influenced by their judgment, and at their solicitation, Porter postponed the execution of the order for two hours, and directed that the army move at 3 o'clock in the morning instead of at 1. He at once sent notice of this action to General Pope.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask, who gives that testimony?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Who gives that testimony? It comes directly, sir, from the mouths of General Morell, General Sykes, and General Butterfield; and I will call your attention to it in a minute so that you can not dispute it.

This delay, under these circumstances, constituted the basis for the first specification under the first charge made against General Porter. It will not be necessary to spend much time in the consideration of this specification. It was charged that, being in the face of the enemy, General Porter then and there disobeyed the said order. The court-martial pronounced him guilty, and we are called upon in effect to pass a bill that shall pronounce him "not guilty." A board of officers, known and honored alike for their impartiality, skill, bravery, and devotion to their country, and consisting of Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty, have fully examined the record and heard all the evidence over, with such new and additional evidence as could be produced on both sides, at a time when the angry passions and prejudices of men had subsided, and have pronounced a verdict of "not guilty." In that verdict the Senate of the United States at its last session concurred. General Grant, the best military authority on the continent, and probably in the world, has passed his judgment to the same effect.

It is true that men, actuated either by base motives, or a hatred of General Porter, or lingering passion or prejudice, have intimated that General Grant gave his opinion in exoneration of General Porter as a bid for the passage of a measure to place him on the retired-list of the Army.

For such base insinuations I have but scorn; for their authors, pity. Can men have the conscience to charge Grant, lately General of our armies and President, with bribery; with selling his opinion?

Sir, I refer to these things, not that they are conclusive upon us, nor that they ought to move us to action on this bill in opposition to our judgment, but that we may duly consider them and give them such weight as they are entitled to; that we may be led to read and investigate; that we may proceed in the light of the facts, and not be controlled or hampered by our preconceived notions of the case, or by any false notions that because the court-martial that convicted Porter was respectable, that because the immortal Lincoln approved the sentence, that because the loved and lamented Garfield constituted one of the court and was supposed to adhere to that sentence, that therefore we ought to oppose this bill. Such considerations are unworthy of fair and honest men. We have no right to assume that Garfield if living would oppose this measure, nor that Lincoln if he had survived the pistol of the assassin would do other than justice to a brave man in the light of the new evidence that came from witnesses not attainable on the original trial.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I have not time enough to stop to answer questions. When I occupied the floor last evening, as I see by looking at the minutes taken, nine-tenths of my time was occupied in answering questions of gentlemen and listening to their remarks instead of their listening to mine. I must therefore decline to be further interrupted. [Applause.] I think I ought to have the right to talk just a little when I am given an hour to address the House.

Mr. STEELE. I will say to the gentleman that I was interrupted a number of times when I was addressing the committee, and the gentleman has had his time extended.

Mr. RAY, of New York. At 3 o'clock in the morning, and long before it was light enough to see, Porter's corps was put under arms and took up the line of march; but in the darkness it was found impossible to make much if any headway, and much confusion ensued. Two officers who passed over the road that night testified that they found it impossible to keep the road, and that they stumbled upon obstructions which they could not see until they were upon them. It is, therefore, apparent to any candid man that Porter's army could not have been moved to Bristoe during the night without such straggling, confusion, and exhaustion that it would have been worthless upon its arrival. These things were known to and appreciated by Porter, Morell, Sykes, and Butterfield; they were unknown to Pope.

It has been asserted here that when that order was received General Porter sent for his generals and held with them a council of war as to whether or not the order should be obeyed. The injustice and the folly of such a charge is fully exposed when we turn to the evidence of Capt. Drake De Kay, who said: "I arrived, as I have stated, about half past 9 o'clock at his tent, and found General Porter and two or three generals there—General Sykes and General Morell, and, I think, General Butterfield, though I am not sure whether he came in afterward or not. I handed General Porter the order, which he read and then handed to one of his generals." And yet gentlemen say he concealed it.

Mr. HORR. Not that order.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I can not stop now for interruptions. You come down here like bees after honey. I have not time.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman does not want to say that I said that order was concealed. What I said was that the 4.30 order was concealed.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I said no such thing. I said that had been asserted on this floor. I did not refer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. STEELE. Allow me to ask the gentleman——

Mr. RAY, of New York. If these interruptions continue I can only repeat what I said yesterday:

> Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies among his worshipers.

Mr. STEELE. We will give you all the time we take up in interruptions.

Mr. RAY, of New York. On the march that morning Porter used great personal exertions to get the obstructions out of the way, and riding on in advance reported to Pope two hours (8 o'clock) before the arrival of his column. Pope made no complaint at the delay, nor did he seem to entertain the slightest idea that his order had been disobeyed. If he did, it was his duty as a loyal soldier and a faithful general to have removed Porter from the command. Indeed, he says that he made no complaint, and "the necessity had passed away." It is a conceded rule of military law that a corps, division, or brigade commander at a distance from his superior is clothed with a discretion as to the time and mode of obeying an order, provided he is in possession of facts which make a literal compliance with the order impracticable or impossible. This discretion was used by Porter on this occasion, and it worked no disadvantage to the success of Pope or of the Union Army. Let me ask, if the campaign had terminated in success would complaint have been made?

General Sykes, whose subsequent military career was so brilliant, said:

> We talked it over among ourselves and thought nothing was to be gained by moving at midnight or 1 a. m. rather than at dawn. I was very positive in my opinion, and gave General Porter my reasons. They were, first, that a night march is always exceedingly fatiguing and injurious to troops; that my command had already marched from twelve to fourteen miles that day; that I thought the darkness would cause confusion; that a constant stream of wagons had passed ahead of us from the time my command reached Warrenton Junction until dusk; and, above all, I thought that as but two hours, or three hours at most, would elapse between 1 o'clock and daylight we could make the march in much better order, and march more rapidly by starting at dawn than if we started at the hour prescribed. I might add that General Porter made his decision not to move until daylight, and I took it that his decision was based upon his own experience and upon the opinions of the three general officers in his corps next in rank to himself.

He also says that in the morning—

> Before I directed the advance to be sounded I sent an aid-de-camp to find the road, so as to lead the column upon it. He returned in a short time and told me that the darkness was so great that he could not distinguish the road. He also told me that he was assisted in that search by several soldiers. As I anticipated, we ran upon this train of wagons within two miles of my camp. They encumbered the road for miles. Myself and staff officers were constantly engaged in opening the way for the head of my column. On several occasions I had to take my mounted escort and place them on the road with drawn sabers to prevent the wagons from closing up any intervals that occurred. I do not think that in my military life I ever had so much trouble with a train as I had that day. About two miles from Bristoe Station a stream crossed the road. On the Bristoe side of the stream General Porter and his staff officers directed and compelled all their wagons to be parked so that none of them should precede my troops. That order was carried out. I was compelled to halt the head of my command on the Bristoe side of that stream for fully an hour in order that my rear brigades might be united with the brigade in advance, and the cause of this separation was the train or trains on the road.

He then says that "nothing whatever" would have been gained by starting at 1 o'clock in the morning, and that he had been in continual intercourse with General Porter during the month of August, and that he never saw in him any slackness to do his duty nor any evidence of a disposition to fail his commanding officer or his country, and that he pushed his command vigorously from Falmouth to the scenes of the actions of the 29th and 30th. To the same effect, only more positive, is the evidence of General Butterfield and General Morell, as well as of a large number of officers of lesser rank. In the face of this evidence from officers of the highest character and standing, how shallow, unjust, and unfounded the charge that General Porter was guilty of any violation of military law by this exercise of discretion, urged and approved as it was by the generals of his corps and acquiesced in by General Pope himself.

It has been claimed during this discussion that Porter might have marched that night; that Sigel and Ricketts marched that night and found no difficulty. How unjust such statements on the floor of this House are is fully shown when we glance at the testimony of General McDowell given before his board of inquiry. He says:

> To make sure of this I ordered the troops (Ricketts's) to march at 2 a. m.; * * * and notwithstanding I had seen him on the morning of the 28th before he left, and had urged on him personally to march immediately and rapidly, and had shown him General Pope's order to me requiring this to be done, yet his advance was so slow that the note written to me by Captain Leski at Thoroughfare Gap at 10.45 a. m. and received by me near Gainesville and then sent to General Ricketts, reached him just this side of Buckland Mills, a distance of about three miles from his bivouac of the night before. His division had been on their feet since 2 a. m., over nine hours, and in that time had not gone twice the length of the division front from where they started.

He was speaking of General Ricketts, one of the generals who sat on the court-martial that tried Porter, and who was one of the court that pronounced Porter guilty of disobedience of the order to march that same night at 1 a. m. General Ricketts had only about two hundred wagons on the road, a fine turnpike, while there was on the narrow road in front of General Porter two thousand or three thousand wagons. In the face of this testimony, coming as it does from the lips of General McDowell, may I not ask this House to say that General Porter and his division commanders adopted the wisest and most judicious course?

It is the duty of a general ever to keep his command in condition to meet the enemy when he has reason to think that an enemy is near, and to knowingly wear them out and disintegrate the command would be deserving of most severe censure. Every person who has marched with a fatigued army in the night knows the utter impossibility of preventing straggling. Porter's corps was under arms and attempting to move at 3 a. m., and had the obstructions not prevented he would have been at Bristoe shortly after daylight. As the enemy had gone, as the order to move stated it was retreating, there was no necessity for the presence of Porter.

But the gentleman said that it was the order to be at Bristoe at daylight, and that that was the essence of the order; that it was the duty of Porter to have started immediately, if necessary, to reach Bristoe at daylight.

I assert that it was the duty of Porter to act judiciously and wisely, promptly and obediently, but to take care of his command, and see that it was at Bristoe with its commander in a condition for service. Gentlemen have entirely ignored the fact that when it was determined to delay the march until 3 o'clock, information of the determination was at once sent to General Pope by two or three of Pope's staff officers, who started at once, and that they were seven hours on the road, and were so delayed by the obstructions that, mounted as they were, it was 7 o'clock in the morning when they reached Bristoe. This shows how futile would have been the effort to move the army. It should also be remembered that Porter had no cavalry whatever, and the impossibility of infantry clearing a narrow road of an army train in the night is so plain that argument is unnecessary. When the gentlemen reflect they must acknowledge their error.

The evidence of the surgeon, who says that at noon, or just after noon, as the corps of Porter was entering Bristoe, he heard Porter say, "Go tell Morell to halt his division; I don't care a damn if we don't get there," has no weight with me. Faxon says they were then at Bristoe. It was the very place to which they were ordered to march, and the only place. Porter had reported to Pope two hours before that and had received orders to remain there that day. The remark, if made, had no reference to getting to Bristoe. They were "there," and under orders to remain "there."

Pope having said to Porter that he had beaten Jackson, who was retreating up the railroad, and only intimating that haste was required for the purpose of following a retreating enemy, at once sent a dispatch to McDowell directing him to march at daylight upon Manassas Junction, in which he said: "We had a severe fight with them to-day, driving them back several miles along the railroad. If you will march promptly and rapidly at the earliest dawn of day upon Manassas Junction we shall bag the whole crowd." Is there any intimation here that Hooker was in danger or that any peril was impending? To both McDowell and Porter he asserts that the enemy is "retreating," but to Porter he does not even intimate that if he will hurry up the enemy can be bagged. He clearly left Porter to infer that he wanted his corps in the morning for the purpose of following a retreating enemy and no other, and it justified Porter in obeying the order in such a manner as should bring the troops on the ground in condition to be of some service if he was satisfied that the arrival would not be delayed by the postponement of the hour of departure.

On the court-martial General Pope testified that his main reason for ordering Porter to march at 1 o'clock in the morning and be at Bristoe at daylight was that Hooker was substantially out of ammunition, leaving the court to infer that a mighty peril was impending over that army when the night order was sent Porter, and that his presence at daylight was supposed to be necessary for the salvation of that army. This has been urged as a reason why this bill should fail and Porter stand condemned.

Now, sir, it turned out on inquiry that Pope did not learn of Hooker's need until about three hours after the order to Porter was sent.

Sir, I ask, was his evidence honest and truthful? Was it just to Porter? Can we, as honorable men, regard it? The star of Pope has set forever; Porter's is emerging from the cloud of perjury and calumny that obscured it, and shall guide him to higher fields of glory.

In point of fact there was no necessity for the order when it was given, or if there was, such necessity had passed away long before daylight. No move of consequence was made by Pope on the 28th except to move the main portion of his army to Manassas; and this move, it is now conceded, resulted in no good, but ultimately worked much harm. Porter remained all day at Bristoe. The only act upon which was based a charge of disobedience of this order was the delay of two hours in marching. In the light of the facts that Porter was allowed to remain in the command of his corps until the termination of Pope's campaign, and thereafter until after the battle of Antietam and the removal of McClellan in November, during all of which time no charge had been preferred and no court-martial convened, and that it was proved by Colonel Ruggles, Pope's chief of staff, that Pope told Porter that his explanations of the transactions between August 26 and August 31 were satisfactory, no fair mind can conclude otherwise, in my judgment, than that the charge was made to cover the defects of Pope's campaign and transfer the responsibility for its failure from his shoulders to those of the person he was determined to sacrifice in order to justify in the eyes of the country his failure in that most ill-managed and disastrous campaign, while at the same time he should revenge the criticisms of Porter on his military capacity. Otherwise I can not conceive why the charges should have been delayed until McClellan's removal.

Nothing had been discovered in the mean time that threw any new light upon Porter's conduct. These charges were made and signed by a member of General Pope's staff, General Roberts, who hated Porter and was an active defender and partisan of General Pope. His malice was shown in his evidence. If General Pope believed the charges, why did he not make them? Why were they deferred? The answer is plain; if they failed he was not answerable; if they were sustained his object was gained, his revenge satisfied. While McClellan and Porter were in command he knew it would be useless to prefer them. But when McClellan had been superseded he embraced his opportunity.

On the trial at the court-martial Pope swore in substance that he had nothing to do with the charges or the prosecution; "I do not know who made the charges." After the conviction he wrote:

I considered it a duty I owed to the country to bring Fitz-John Porter to justice. * * * With his conviction and punishment ended all official connection I have since had with anything that related to the operations I conducted in Virginia.

If this charge stood by itself it would fall of its own weight to the disgrace of its author. On the trial before the court-martial significance to that delay was attempted to be given by the evidence of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, who, after stating certain expressions which he claimed General Porter made to him on the 28th of August, while at Bristoe, was allowed, contrary to and in violation of all rules of evidence, to characterize the remarks and state what they appeared to him to express. The witness said:

Those remarks were made in a sneering manner and appeared to me to express a great indifference.

He was then allowed to state what he told General Pope thereafter, not in the presence of General Porter, and he testified as follows:

After my tent was pitched and I had something to eat I went over to General Pope and reported to him briefly what I had done in regard to the ammunition. I then said to him, "General, I saw General Porter on my way here." Said he, "Well, sir." I said, "General, he will fail you." "Fail me," said he, "what do you mean? What did he say?" Said I, "It is not so much what he said, though he said enough; he is going to fail you." The witness then goes on to state that he told Pope he was certain that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor, and that he would shoot him that night so far as any crime before God was concerned if the law would allow him to do it.

The admission of this conversation, the truth of which I deny, should of itself reverse Porter's conviction. The admission of such testimony, contrary to all sense, reason, and law, would reverse the conviction of a chicken-thief in any of the courts of this country, and I am frank to say would lead me to support this bill irrespective of all other questions. A man charged with crime should be convicted, if convicted at all, upon legal evidence and because of some act done by him with guilty intent, and that intent should be shown by acts or declarations of the accused and not by declarations of other persons not in his presence. And it is contrary to the rules of evidence to allow a witness to characterize even the acts and declarations of the accused; much less may he be allowed to state the impression made upon him by those acts or declarations. Colonel Smith may have been a man of the most tender susceptibilities and of the highest patriotism and entitled to the highest credit, but I am frank to say that a man who will carry the spirit of murder in his bosom and announce that he would execute his base design were it not for fear of the law, and that simply because another man had sneered in a manner that appeared to him to "express a great indifference," has no credit with me when I come to consider his evidence.

The judge-advocate, in reviewing the case and in speaking of the evidence of this man Smith, said:

It was physically impossible for the witness to produce the manner, the tone of voice, and the expression of the eye, and the play of the features which may have so much influenced his judgment; yet these often afford a language much more to be relied upon than that of the lips. He could not hold up before the court for its inspection and appreciation the sneer of which he spoke, and yet we know that a sneer is as palpable to the mental as a smile is to the natural vision. It is a life-long experience that souls read each other, and there are intercommunings of spirits through instrumentalities which, while defying all human analysis, nevertheless completely command the homage of human faith. Great crimes, too, like great virtues, often reveal themselves to close observers of character and conduct as unmistakably as a flower garden announces its presence by the odors it breathes upon the air.

All of this was fine and poetical, but nonsense as applied to this case notwithstanding. I know not what kind of nor how much "spirits" this man Smith had communed with on the occasion when he went to Pope with murder in his heart, but this I do know, that his soul had not read Fitz-John Porter's soul, and that while the sneer may have been palpable to the mental vision of Smith, we have no evidence of the number of spirits nor of the kind, good or bad, ethereal or liquid, that may have been dancing through the focus of that vision. The true character and revengful spirit of this man Smith may have and probably did reveal themselves unmistakably to General Fitz-John Porter by the odors he breathed upon the air, thereby producing the sneer of which he spoke.

In my judgment the whole evidence of Thomas C. H. Smith, aid-de-camp on the staff of General Pope, was a "vision" without substance, and of the most evanescent character. Striking this evidence out of the case, as we ought, and we have nothing that by the most strained construction can be tortured into a spirit of insubordination.

I deny that any expression in any of the letters and dispatches indicate any animus or intent to disobey. That service under Pope was distasteful to Porter no man can question. That he distrusted Pope's military capacity—a feeling that was shared by the army, and which subsequent events justified—I am not to dispute. That he had a "contempt for Pope" I do deny. It is disputed by Porter's every act and deed. There is nothing in the record that shows disrespect for the man as a man. He was not tried for disrespect to his superior officer.

After that campaign Pope was retired from active service at the front. The Government itself fully justified Porter's estimate of the man—Pope was brave, energetic, self-confident, but incapable of managing an army. Such is the verdict of history.

Porter saw that the Army of Virginia was "wandering around loose," its whereabouts unknown to Pope; that it was being marched to death; and he incautiously, indiscreetly expressed his distrust.

General Burnside saw nothing in these dispatches to censure or incite distrust, and he so testified; and he also said that during all the friendly and extremely intimate relations he held with Porter he never heard him speak an unkind word of General Pope, and so testified all of Porter's intimate friends. Is it conceivable that General Porter would have unbosomed and expressed a hatred, disrespect, and disloyalty to General Pope to Smith and Roberts, members of Pope's military household, who would have been sure to expose him, while to his own military family and friends he always spoke of him kindly and respectfully? Such a course of conduct is not probable nor reasonable, and the evidence of Smith and Roberts taxes our credulity to the point of disbelief.

Men do not become great criminals all at at once, and the military training, long-devoted service, conspicuous bravery, and devotion of Porter give the lie to the insinuation. He was fresh from fields of fame, suffering from debility contracted among the swamps of the Chickahominy and in the service of his country, and still begrimed with the smoke and flame of the enemy's guns. Is it to be supposed for a moment that Sykes and Morell and Butterfield had imbibed the same spirit of insubordination? If so, they too should have been summarily dealt with, for they were particeps criminis. They urged and advised and approved the actions of their chief.

On this question of animus I should be unjust to myself, to Fitz-John Porter, and to the country were I not to invite attention to the most flagrant violation of the rules of evidence on that trial. The Government put in evidence the dispatches of the 27th, written before any alleged disobedience of orders, for the avowed purpose of showing animus. General Porter offered other letters and also acts immediately preceding and following the alleged disobedience and misbehavior, showing great zeal and activity in behalf of General Pope, to show want of animus, claiming, justly and legally, that his whole conduct and declarations should be considered on that question as part of the res gestæ. This was ruled out. What! Prove the conversations between Generals Pope and Smith, not in the presence of Porter, nor of any one, as showing animus, and not allow him the poor privilege of proving his own concurrent acts and orders, which were a part of the movement, to rebut such presumptions!

There is not a lawyer upon the floor of this House but knows the error would reverse the finding in any criminal court on the face of the globe. No wonder a storm of indignation burst over the country that produced a partial reversal of that ruling, but the court disregarded the evidence nevertheless. I refer the House to the official record and the protest filed by General Porter on the trial.

We come now to the consideration of the next specification contained in the charges, and which is more serious in its nature, if true. It charges in substance that on the 29th of August, Porter, having been ordered to move with the joint commands of himself and McDowell from Manassas towards Gainesville, until communication was established between the forces of Pope and those of McDowell and Porter, that then the whole command should halt, did then and there disobey the said order. The next specification charges in substance that Porter disobeyed an order to attack the right flank of the enemy, and which was issued at 4.30 p. m. of the same day, and that he retreated away and fell back from the enemy shamefully, &c. The orders are as follows:

JOINT ORDER.

[General Orders, No. 5.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals McDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies.

I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I had not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of the corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out.

One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be for the present with Heintzelman's corps or at this place (Centreville).

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

4.30 ORDER.

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, August 29—4.30 p. m.

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so on your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Major-General PORTER.

On the morning of the 29th Porter had moved, pursuant to orders from General Pope, from Bristoe on Centreville, and while on the march early in the morning of the 29th to that point Porter received the order first quoted, and known as the joint order. He immediately countermarched, having passed Manassas, and took the road from Manassas to Gainesville.

On reading the joint order, we find three things, controlling ideas, that strike us with peculiar force:

First. It indicates that a battle against the combined forces of Jackson and Longstreet is to be avoided south of Bull Run.

Second. There is nothing said about any anticipated battle, but it seems to contemplate a concentration of the army only.

Third. It plainly implies that the army is to fall back that night (29th) or in the night behind Bull Run.

The order says:

I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. * * * It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run or Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of supplies. * * * One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here (Centreville) by to-morrow night (30th) or next day.

In his orders, issued that same morning to Generals Heintzelman, Reno, and Sigel, who were to move on the Warrenton pike, he said:

If you find yourselves heavily pressed by superior numbers of the enemy you will not push matters further. * * * The command must return to this place (Centreville) to-night or by morning, on account of subsistence and forage.

It is to be presumed that Porter knew the desires and the intentions of his chief so plainly expressed, and it is equally plain that on the morning of the 29th Pope did not intend to bring on a general engagement with the combined forces of Jackson and Longstreet. When they should combine, it is the plainly expressed intention to fall back behind Bull Run. It is also his determination to fall back behind Bull Run that night, or by morning, in any event.

In the light of these facts, which were partially concealed or wholly lost sight of on the court-martial, and which were never brought to the notice or knowledge of President Lincoln, we see how unjust was any criticism on the letter written by Porter expressing a determination to fall back on the evening of the 29th, and which was written before the 4.30 order was received. But as I stated, on receiving the joint order Porter at once moved for Gainesville. McDowell with his command was immediately behind Porter.

This move was made promptly upon receipt of the order, and the advance was continued until Dawkin's Branch, a small stream about two miles beyond Bethlehem church, was reached. Beyond this stream the enemy was discovered, apparently in force. Porter threw out skirmishers, deployed his advance, and made all preparations for carrying the hills beyond. That the army would have been engaged in a fierce and sanguinary contest within a short time had not General McDowell at this time arrived upon the ground is beyond question and has never been disputed. General Porter was carrying out the order in its spirit and letter. General McDowell was the senior of Porter, and at once took the command. He at once, on viewing the situation, said to Porter: "Porter, you are too far out. This is no place to fight a battle." (See evidence of Colonel Locke, page 135, O. R.; of Captain Martin, page 141; of F. S. Earle, pages 417, 426.)

And this General McDowell does not deny.

Question. Try to recollect if upon that occasion you did not say to him in substance that he was too far in the front, and that the position in which he was was not a position in which to fight a battle, or anything to that effect?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Q. Will you say whether in consequence of a message or otherwise you sent a message to the accused with your compliments, telling him that you were going to the right and should take King with you, and that he, the accused, should remain where he was for the present, and if he had to fall back to do so on your left?

A. I do not recollect. (O. R. 87 and 88.)

They then rode over the ground together, and decided that it was impossible by extending to the right to connect with the forces of General Reynolds, who was upon the left of Pope and two miles or more away, and by nearest road four or five miles, and the intervening woods were impassable. McDowell's forces, fifteen thousand men, were then up with Porter's, about ten thousand or twelve thousand more, so that McDowell had on the ground and on the road along which he and Porter were ordered to move a force of at least twenty-five thousand men. It will be observed that this order was addressed to both, and that McDowell, being in command while on the ground, was in duty bound to see the order carried out. If the time had come when the command was to halt, as directed by the order, then a halt was proper. If circumstances had arisen that made a farther advance at that time impossible, impracticable, or unwise, it was within the province of General McDowell to suspend a farther advance and report the situation.

If such circumstances had not arisen, then it was the duty of McDowell to remain with Porter and press the whole force forward toward Gainesville. If such circumstances had not arisen, he had no right to divide the forces and march away with the larger portion. If it was the duty of Porter at any time that day before the 4.30 order was received to advance farther along that road in the face of the enemy, it was equally and more the duty of McDowell to advance along the same road. They both knew that the enemy was in their front. They both knew that the joint order contemplated an attack by their combined force on the flank of the enemy if it should be reached. They both knew that Pope's command was then engaged with the enemy on the Warrenton pike, two miles north of them. McDowell knew that if they were on the flank of the enemy and it was proper to attack, the larger the assaulting force the better—the more promise of success; and he must have known that if none but Jackson's command was in front of Pope that Pope had force enough to hold him in check, and that a force of twenty-five thousand men hurled upon Jackson's right flank must inevitably have resulted in his entire overthrow and probable capture.

It is plain to my mind that if any one disobeyed the joint order it was McDowell and not Porter. The order directed both, not one, to advance along that road, and when McDowell assumed the responsibility of taking fifteen thousand men, including King's division, which had been ordered to act that day under the command of Porter, and marched away, he relieved Porter from any further duty or responsibility under that order. He left Porter in a position and situation not contemplated by the order, that is, unsupported by the forces of McDowell.

But it is plain to my mind that the attack at Dawkin's Branch was suspended by the order of McDowell, because he knew of the arrival upon the ground of Longstreet's forces, and because he knew that they were facing the united forces of Longstreet and Jackson, the arrival of fifteen thousand men of Longstreet's corps having been reported some hours before. And he knew that if fifteen thousand of Longstreets's men had passed through Gainesville at 9.30 o'clock that morning on their way to Jackson that the balance of Lee's army was not far behind. He therefore knew that the joint order of Pope, in which he had assumed that Lee's army could not arrive on the ground before the night of the 30th or the morning of the 31st, was based upon a misconception, and that it was not wise for him to bring on an engagement in that exposed situation with the whole of Lee's army.

At any rate he knew that fifteen thousand fresh confederate troops were on the ground, and that their arrival was unknown to Pope when the joint order was issued, and that probably an attack by the divided Union Army upon the united confederates was not intended. In fact the order directed that nothing should be done that should operate to prevent the Army from falling back that night beyond Bull Run, where it was evidently the intention of Pope to meet the enemy when they should unite.

The orders for the 29th show on their face that a pursuit of Jackson, who was supposed to be retreating, was the only move contemplated for the day.

I am satisfied that McDowell left with the intention of passing up the Sudley Springs road and until he could connect with Reynolds's left; that he intended then to deploy to his left, while Porter should extend on his right, and thus connect the whole line; that he intended that Porter should remain where he was until that movement was completed, and that he so said. That Porter so understood and acted upon that understanding is beyond question. All that afternoon Porter's skirmish line was in the woods beyond Dawkin's Branch, and Colonel Marshall, an officer of unquestioned integrity, was observing the enemy. So near was he to the enemy that he could hear the tramp of the men and the commands of the confederate officers and the rumble of the artillery.

Now, when McDowell left, he left Porter free to act as the circumstances dictated he should act. McDowell had the right to remain on the ground and command the whole force; but he had no right to give orders to Porter that should control his action after he left. Therefore it is entirely immaterial whether, as McDowell put spurs to his horse and galloped away, taking King's division with him, in all 15,000 men, he said, "Put your forces in here," or as Porter says, and as two good reliable witnesses say, he said, "Stay where you are." Porter was tried and adjudged guilty of disobeying the joint order, not some disputed and vague order that McDowell may or may not have given.

Evidently McDowell thought that a battle ought not to be fought at Dawkin's Branch; evidently he did not expect that Porter would fight when he left him, at least until he should have connected with the left of Reynolds and closed the gap of two miles between the army of Pope and Porter's corps. If it were otherwise, is it not passing strange that McDowell passed on his four-mile march to join Pope and expressed no surprise that he heard not the guns of Porter on the flank of Jackson? Is it not strange that when he met Captain Pope with the order from Pope directing Porter to move forward and attack Jackson on the flank at once he did not say, "Why, I gave Porter that order two or three hours ago," instead of saying "That it was an important order," as Captain Pope testified he did say?

No blame can be attached to Porter for not engaging the enemy up to the time that McDowell left. Up to that time McDowell was on the ground and had supreme command. I now repeat, that if it was not prudent and proper for McDowell and Porter to attack at Dawkin's Branch with twenty-five thousand men; it was not prudent and proper for Porter to attack with only ten thousand or twelve thousand men after McDowell left. There has been considerable dispute as to what occurred at the time McDowell left. It has been claimed that McDowell left imperative orders to attack at once. McDowell himself makes no such claim; all he claimed was that Porter was to attack at the proper time. All it is claimed that he said was, "You put your men in here." I assert that that time never arrived. McDowell did not come in on the left of Reynolds at all, but on reaching a point near the Warrenton pike he was ordered by Pope to another part of the field.

We now come to the great and important question involved in this case. All enemies and opponents of General Porter have substantially abandoned any claim that any great blame attaches to General Porter up to the time of the receipt by him of the 4.30 order, so called. It is claimed that he willfully and deliberately disobeyed that order, and that instead of attacking as ordered, or at all, he retreated.

That order is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29—4.30 p. m.

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds.

The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank.

Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back do so on your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Major-General PORTER.

It will be seen at a glance that if at the time of the receipt of that order General Longstreet with his corps, or any considerable part of it, was confronting Porter, the conditions provided by the order did not exist, and could not be complied with. If Longstreet was there with his army fronting Porter, then Porter's line of march did not bring him "on the enemy's right flank," nor anywhere near it. It brought him in the immediate front of a largely superior force of the enemy, posted upon a ridge, with thick woods intervening. By that order Porter was to do not one thing, but two things: "Push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and if possible his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds."

To attack on the flank or in the rear was absolutely impossible, and to keep in communication with Reynolds was also impossible. He had no communication to keep; all the afternoon he had been sending men to his right towards Reynolds, trying as faithfully as possible to establish communication, but he had failed. The men had either been driven back by the enemy or captured. It is a very important question when that order was received. While it is clear to my mind that Porter would have been fully justified in not attempting to obey it, inasmuch as to attack on the right flank and rear was impossible without making a long détour to the left in the presence of a superior force of the enemy advantageously posted, a movement condemned by all military men as well as by common sense; and also inasmuch as Porter knew what Pope did not, that Longstreet and Lee were there on the ground, yet we will waive the point, and see whether any attack could be made. A night attack upon an unknown enemy, and upon broken, wooded, and unknown ground, would be condemned by the school-boy. Yet such was the only attack Porter could have made if the order was received at the time he and his witnesses state, namely, sundown or after.

General Sykes, whose veracity no man has ever questioned, said that he was present when Pope delivered the order; the order was received as near sundown as he could remember. (Page 177, O. R.): "Certainly within a little before sunset or after." Colonel Locke says that it was delivered "between sundown and dusk" (page 136, O. R.). Captain Monteith says "it was about sundown" (page 127, O. R.). Lieutenant Weld says it was "after sundown" (page 130–132, O. R.). Lieutenant Ingham says it was "after sunset" (page 199, O. R.). Captain Randol: "It was growing dark. It was between 6 and 7" (page 93.). Six disinterested witnesses, all to the same point and all unimpeached and unimpeachable, say that this order was received at so late an hour that an attack was not only impracticable but impossible.

These witnesses were contradicted before the court-martial by two witnesses only, one Captain Pope, a relative of General Pope, the other his orderly, Duffee. Pope and Duffee think they delivered that order by 5 o'clock on the 29th. They had no watch; they made no memorandum; and they both confess they only guess at the time from the time they think it took them to go to Porter's headquarters, and they fix the date of starting by the date of the order (4.30) and by an estimate of the distance traveled. Pope said he had no recollection of the time it took him to deliver the order (567, O. R.).

There is no evidence that the writing of the order was completed at 4.30, nor that it was delivered to Captain Pope immediately after it was written. The distance was four or five miles, over a rough, broken, and to them unknown road. After the court-martial, as was proved by two reputable witnesses, Pope confesses that he got lost on the way and did not deliver the order until nearly dark.

It is proved beyond dispute that he had to be shown the way back. On the hearing before the board of inquiry a new witness was produced, Archelaus Dyer, who claimed that he accompanied Pope and Duffee on that occasion. He had been recently over the road with Smith, the soul-reader, and he testified that when he went with them to deliver that order he passed a certain house with a peculiar roof, and that he passed in the road on a certain side of that house; that they went to Bethlehem church, where they found Porter in his tent, and that he saw Porter go behind his tent; that this church was of brick, with a steeple, &c.

It was proved that the house he described was not built until the year after the second battle of Manassas, that the road then passed on the other side of that house, that the church never had a steeple or belfry, and that at the time described it was a tumbled ruin. It was also proved that on that day Porter did not have a tent; that he lay under a tree when the order was delivered; a fact that Captain Pope himself had testified to. I am also informed by a gentleman, whose word I shall never question, that on the hearing before the board of inquiry two other men were then produced by this Thomas C. H. Smith, the soul-reader and sweet communer with spirits (the nature of which we are not informed), who, after the cross-examination of Dyer, said to Smith, "You know he was not there and that we were not there, and we are not going to swear to any such thing."

To be mild, I will only say that if the testimony of Captain Pope is half as wild, unreliable, and bombastic as were the reports of General Pope, it is not entitled to a feather's weight. And as to the witness Dyer, he stands upon his own evidence a self-convicted perjurer. Every circumstance supports the claim that this 4.30 order was not delivered until sundown or after. And if there were any doubt on the question, it is our duty to give General Fitz-John Porter the benefit of that doubt, as in the law I am bound to do.

It is true that witnesses are to be weighed and not counted; that it is what satisfies the mind and conscience and convinces the judgment that should guide our conclusions in giving our votes in this case; and it is because of these rules that I am convinced that duty to myself, my country, and my God demands that I support this bill.

We sit here as the court of appeals in this case, the only court that can right the great wrong done, reverse the unlawful judgment of the court-martial, and set aside the mistaken verdict. If we honestly, faithfully, and conscientiously discharge that duty, relying upon the evidence, and hesitate not to reverse the action of that court if any of its material proceedings were unjust and unlawful, or if upon newly discovered evidence we are convinced that the court arrived at a wrong conclusion or one it would not have reached if the whole evidence had been produced, we shall have done honor to ourselves and this Government, and we should not by such action cast any reflection upon that court or any member of it.

If in this spirit we approach the vital question in this case, divesting ourselves of all passion, prejudice, and preconceived erroneous impressions, it seems to me that the verdict of this House must be unanimous.

It is undisputed that on the receipt of the 4.30 order General Porter immediately ordered an attack. Colonel Locke says (page 136, O. R.):

He [referring to General Pope's messenger with the 4.30 order] handed the general a note, which I afterward ascertained was an order for him to attack the enemy at once. He (General Porter) very soon afterward ordered me to ride up to General Morell and direct him to move forward and attack the enemy immediately, and to say that he would be up himself right after me.

This he did. But before Colonel Locke went up Porter had sent Morell a written order to attack, as General Morell testifies (page 147, O. R.):

A little while before sunset, just about sunset, I received an order in pencil from General Porter to make disposition to attack the enemy. That order spoke of the enemy as retiring. I knew that could not be the case from the reports I had received and also from the sounds of the firing. I immediately sent back word to General Porter that the order must have been given under a misapprehension, but at the same time I began to make dispositions to make the attack in case it was to be made. Colonel Locke soon after came to me with an order from General Porter to make the attack. (Page 150, O. R.)

General Morell produced the written order to attack, and which preceded the one given by Colonel Locke; and it is as follows:

General MORELL: I wish you to push up two regiments, supported by two others, preceded by skirmishers, the regiments at intervals of two hundred yards, and attack the party with a section of a battery opposed to you. The battle works well on our right, and the enemy are said to be retiring up the pike. Give the enemy a good shelling when our troops advance.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Commanding.

Now, if you will read the evidence of Lieutenant-Colonel Earle and of General Morell you will see that this written order from Porter to attack was given even before the 4.30 order was received, and that when Captain Pope arrived orders were out to begin an attack.

Now, can any sane person say that Porter did not intend to fight, that he disobeyed the order? I also quote from a note from Colonel (since General) G. K. Warren, dated 5.45 p. m., August 29, 1862 (see page 427, O. R.). It says:

I then met an orderly from General Porter to General Morell, saying he must push on and press the enemy.

And yet gentlemen stand here and say that General Porter did not intend to fight, that he gave no orders to fight, and that he disobeyed and intended to disobey the order. We have not only the written but the verbal orders of General Porter, issued after the receipt of Pope's order, directing an immediate attack, and we have the note written on the field that night saying that Porter had given the orders to attack. In the face of this evidence, which cannot be controverted, I insist that such assertions are unfounded and unjust.

But gentlemen say that no fighting followed, that the order was afterward countermanded, and that no attack was made. True. But General Morell says that it was too late, that it was just between daylight and dark, and that no attack could be made. The enemy was in front in large force, and the ground was rough and heavily timbered. The enemy were posted on a ridge in a position that was admirably adapted to defense, a very stronghold.

Major Hyland was in front of Morell on the skirmish line, and could hear the commands plainly as if the enemy was forming in line and the movements of the artillery coming into position. He says:

I judge from the movements and the commands given that there was a very large force indeed, probably a larger force than we had. * * * From what information I had, and from what I could get from the other officers, I thought their force was very heavy indeed.

Lieutenant Stevenson says that between 1 and 4 o'clock he joined his regiment on the skirmish line—"could see the enemy; judge him to be between twelve thousand and fifteen thousand; could see his forces of different arms, infantry and artillery; he was receiving re-enforcements."

Col. E. G. Marshall was in command of the skirmish line. Says there was "a very large force, and they were drawn up in line of battle as they came down."

All these facts were reported to Morell at the time and to Porter, still Porter ordered the attack to be made and repeated the order after the remonstrance of Morell.

Colonel Marshall, whom this committee who made this report say is entitled to the highest credit, knew all the facts, and he says that General Morell asked his advice as to making the attack.

Says Colonel Marshall:

I told him by all means not to attack; that it was certain destruction for us to do so; that I for one did not wish to go into that timber and attack the enemy. Their position was a very strong one and they certainly were in force at that time; twice as large as our own force—all of General Porter's corps. If we had attacked them I felt that it was certain destruction. Afterward, at dark, I was sent for by General Porter and questioned very stringently with reference to the enemy, and my remarks to him were the same I am now making and as I made to General Morell.

How it is possible for the gentlemen to contend that General Porter was guilty of disobedience of that order under these circumstances I am unable to see; the witnesses all agree that a flank attack was out of the question, and that an attack in front was all that could be made.

Common sense unaided by military skill tells us that to have moved a force of ten thousand men against such a position in the face of such trained soldiers as Longstreet commanded, and in the gray of the evening when the darkening woods would have rendered every move uncertain and obscure, would have been suicidal. About noon that day McDowell had suspended an attack already begun on that position, as has been proved by five witnesses, and it must have been on the ground that an attack was unwise and injudicious.

If any gentleman disputes the assertion that Porter was in the very act of assaulting the enemy beyond Dawkin's Branch when McDowell arrived on the ground, I desire to call his attention and read for his information the written orders and the evidence of the witnesses. It is undisputed that Morell deployed, formed a line of battle, and that there was skirmishing and artillery firing. Early in the afternoon General Porter sent General Morell this order:

General MORELL: Push over to the aid of Sigel and strike in his rear. If you reach a road up which King is moving and he has got ahead of you, let him pass, but see if you can not give help to Sigel.

* * * * * * *

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

General Morell attempted to do this, but failed because of the thick woods and rough ground. It will be remembered that Sigel was on the turnpike with Pope. I searched the evidence in vain for any proof that Porter hesitated to do any act that should bring on a battle at any proper moment. In vain do I search for evidence that he had a desire to do other than his duty, his whole duty, and nothing but his duty—not only his duty to his commander, General Pope, but his duty to his country and his God. His whole career gives the lie to any other assumption. In the Mexican war, at Cerro Gordo, Contreras, Molino del Rey, the siege of Vera Cruz, Chapultepec, and the capture of the city of Mexico he had fought and shed his blood and never flinched.

At Gaines's Mill and Malvern Hill he had been particularly conspicuous for his gallantry and zeal and courage. Accomplished and brave, he was loved by his soldiers, who under his leadership had won for themselves laurels that will never fade. On the 30th of August he led his corps into the thickest of the fight, making assault after assault that General Lee characterized as most desperate and determined. How well he fought on that day is attested by the fact that his corps lost more men in killed and wounded than any other. If on the 30th General Pope had entertained the idea that Porter had been disloyal or derelict in his duty on the 29th, is it conceivable that he would have been retained in the command and given the post of honor and highest confidence and trust on the 30th? Impossible.

If at the close of Pope's campaign the Government had supposed that Porter had been guilty of any disobedience or neglect of duty, would he have been placed in command of the defenses of Washington as he was? Would he have been ordered with his corps to the field of Antietam? Would he have been allowed to remain in the command of his corps until the 12th of November, more than two months after the battle of Manassas? Did it take two months for Pope and the Government to ascertain that Porter had been guilty of crimes that merited death?

Is it not a significant fact that the removal of McClellan and the arrest of Porter were almost concurrent acts? Has it been forgotten that General Halleck did General Grant great injustice after the capture of Forts Donelson and Henry, the first great successes of the war? Need you be reminded of his sharp and insulting dispatches to that general, and that after the battle of Pittsburg Landing he went up and took command of the Army himself, and spent six weeks in besieging the vacant hills and fields between that place and Cornith, while the enemy reposed and refreshed themselves at that place? Have you forgotten that for two months or more Grant was without a command, and heralded as a drunkard and an incompetent? Is it not remembered that even the brave and gallant and devoted Thomas had been, in fact, superseded when he fought and won the battle of Nashville and destroyed the army of Hood?

Injustice was done these men and accidents saved them. It was only the personal entreaty of Sherman that kept Grant with the Army, smarting as he was under his undeserved and unjust treatment by Halleck. It was the slow train that preserved the command to Thomas and enabled him to win the laurels of Nashville. In the light of history let us be guarded in our action, that we may not add another mistake to the long list already recorded. Great stress has been laid upon the fact that General Porter was deceived by the dragging of brush up and down the road in his front by General Rosser's troops. That they did so drag brush to give the appearance of a large force moving in front is unquestioned.

General Rosser testified before the board of inquiry that such dragging of brush commenced in the forenoon and was stopped as early as 1 o'clock p. m. By that time Longstreet's men were well in position and hungry for an attack. All the time from 12 until 1 o'clock McDowell was on the ground, and if Porter was deceived so was McDowell; if the one deserves criticism for being deceived by the enemy, so does the other. But I can not see what that has to do with this question. If Porter was deceived by the great dust kicked up by Rosser's cavalry, honestly deceived, we may censure him for want of keen penetration, but we can not pronounce it a crime. Other generals have been deceived, other commanders misled by the ruse of the enemy.

If Halleck had known the condition of things at Corinth that place would have been taken in six days instead of six weeks. Yet he was not court-martialed. If the advance of Grant's army had been pushed rapidly to Petersburg in strict obedience to orders, and the generals leading had not been deceived and misled by the enemy and by wrong assumptions and conclusions, Petersburg would have fallen the next day instead of a year or more later. Yet no one was court-martialed or dismissed the service.

On the files among the archives of the Army is a paper indorsed by General Meade in these words:

> Had General Hancock or myself known that Petersburg was to be attacked Petersburg would have fallen.

To capture that city cost the lives of thousands of the bravest and best, yet I have never heard that any general of our Army was censured, court-martialed, or dismissed the service for that mistake.

Something has been said here about the mode of conducting courts-martial and about the organization of the court that tried Fitz-John Porter. It is conceded that during such a trial the accused and his counsel are always excluded from the room during its deliberation upon all questions, while the judge-advocate remains with the court. Such is the law of courts-martial, but is it justice? Should the prosecuting officer be thus in the room, when, even if he takes no part, he may hear all the court say, and thus ascertain their feelings and views of the evidence? Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio what would be his feelings were he on trial for his life to find the court and the jury shut up with the prosecuting attorney, deliberating upon and discussing the legal points of the case only, but in doing which they must of necessity discuss the evidence and its weight and bearings as against the accused?

Judge Holt, the judge-advocate on this trial, was a good lawyer and a patriotic citizen, but no man ever has or ever can prosecute a case of any kind without having his judgment warped by a constant study of and association with one side of the case only. It may be that the court did not seek or ask or have his advice during those deliberations so frequent on this trial, and where so much evidence that was prejudicial to General Porter was illegally admitted and so much that was favorable was illegally ruled out. This may be, but I am not prepared to so believe. I think that his advice and his judgment on legal points, at least, controlled the court.

I do not reflect upon that court, nor upon any single member of it. I am willing to concede that every member was honest in intent, but I do not forget that two of its members were actors in the scenes of August 28, 29, and 30, 1862. I do not forget that if Ricketts and King had not fallen back from Thoroughfare Gap on the 28th, contrary to orders, Longstreet could not have come through that night or on the 29th and that Jackson must have been captured or his force scattered. Their conduct was in question; they were interested, as events proved and as the trial demonstrated. Can any member of this House say, therefore, that they were impartial judges?

I think no man on the floor of this House has intended to attack the character of Lincoln or Garfield or Stanton. In the heat of debate many expressions may escape the lips which are liable to misconception and misconstruction. I am second to no man in my love and admiration of the murdered Garfield. When the stars fade from heaven forever and the sun shall no longer give its light, when countless ages shall have rolled away, there shall yet remain the fame and glory that make radiant the memory of Lincoln and Garfield. How much we owe to the toil and patriotism of Stanton, rugged and severe as it was, history will never tell. In doing his stern duty if he sometimes erred it would create no surprise, nor should it cause any reflections on his memory; neither should we allow any sentimentality to blind our judgments or prevent our correction of all errors when opportunity presents.

It is not immaterial to me what Garfield thought. Having sat as one of the court in the Fitz-John Porter case, if he concurred in that verdict I will give weight to his opinion. If any gentleman can tell me how any member of that court voted I ask for the information. I await an answer. Every member of that court was sworn to secrecy. If any member has made known his vote, either directly or indirectly, he has demonstrated his absolute unfitness for the position and violated that most sacred oath.

If the gentleman from Indiana can present no more forcible argument in this case than a dream of his, he has no place in the argument of this question, for if dreams supply his argument they will control his judgment, and necessarily his vote on this bill will be good or bad according to the kind and quality of his dinner. As he delivered his speech I suppose he thought of the lines of the poet:

> I sing the sweets I know, the charms I feel,
> My morning incense, and my evening meal,
> The sweets of hasty-pudding.

But great stress has been laid upon the fact that General Porter said he had no objection to any member of the court. Could he have changed the court by objection? Hardly. This court-martial was ordered on the 25th of November, 1862, nearly three months after the events of August. In the mean time Porter had invited investigation, had clamored for a military court of inquiry, that his conduct might be fully examined. That was not granted. The loved and ever-lamented President made the order, but I assume that the stern and rugged Stanton had prejudged the case; that he induced its suppression and the substitution of an order for a court-martial. But Porter did not object. Feeling secure in his innocence, he went before the court confident of a triumphant vindication. "Innocence is ever simple and credulous; conscious of no designs in itself, it suspects none in others." He knew not that Pope was in possession of his private correspondence, and he little thought of the misconstruction that was placed upon it. He little knew of the hatred burning in the bosom of Pope. He little suspected that witnesses would come into that court and be allowed to characterize the expressions of his face as evidence of treason to Pope and disobedience of orders. I am fully aware that many of my Republican friends upon this floor are disposed to pay but little heed to the new evidence produced before the court of inquiry at West Point. It is said that it comes from confederate sources. Pause, gentlemen, and reflect. Can you for one moment suspect that any confederate officer would misstate a fact to aid General Porter? We knew they were misled and mistaken, but yet our brothers. They were children of the Union of the States who had loved and defended and who still love and defend the old starry flag, and I then thought, although wearing the blue while they wore the grey and fought under the stars the bars, and I still believe, that there was no time when they felt not a glow of pride as they caught sight of the Stars and Stripes of their fathers.

Buford, a general in the Union army, reported at least fourteen thousand confederates passing through Gainesville at 9.30 of the morning of the 29th. Longstreet says his corps was up by 11 and in position by noon, or soon after; many others say the same.

The testimony of every confederate officer shows that the forces of Longstreet—twenty-five thousand or more—were on or near the Warrenton pike in Porter's front all the afternoon of the 29th. They were formed on the right of Jackson, to the south of the pike, across the railroad, and in the immediate front of Porter. The reports of the confederate officers, made at the time, show conclusively how this was.

General D. R. Jones commanded the rear division of Longstreet's forces. He said in his report made then:

> Early on the morning of the 29th I took up the march in the direction of the old battle-ground of Manassas, whence heavy firing was heard. Arriving on the ground about noon, my command was stationed on the extreme right of our line.

This was in front of Porter.

Says Longstreet:

> Hood's division was deployed on the right and left of the Warrenton turnpike at right angles with it. General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad to the right, and in echelon with regard to the three last brigades.

This is the railroad across which Morell deployed about noon and where he was cannonaded, his horse being struck and several men being killed by infantry firing. It is evident, then, that the whole force of Longstreet, except one brigade, was in Porter's front, and that any advance would have struck that overwhelming force, not the flank of Jackson. The sworn testimony of General Longstreet, given before the board (page 59, &c.), shows twenty-five thousand confederates within easy call and several thousand in Porter's immediate front. The report of General Stuart (at page 70) shows the same. Beverly H. Robinson testifies that long before noon heavy forces were in front of Porter's, and he says if Porter had advanced on that road he would have struck the confederates about their center.

I now, sir, desire to call the attention of the gentlemen who oppose this bill to new evidence on these important questions that does not come from confederate sources. It comes from Union officers and soldiers who took an important part in the scenes of August 29. At the time of the court-martial, remember, General Porter was under arrest; these men were at the front; General Porter was not permitted to visit them, and every door of information was closed against him.

General M. R. Patrick (page 184) says that he was in command of a brigade of King's division, and on the 29th of August was halted with the command above Bethlehem church just in rear of Porter's corps; that McDowell had told him that morning that he and King's division were to go with Porter; that about 1 o'clock McDowell came down from the front and said that Sigel was in a bad way. "I am going to take you away from Porter; Porter has gone as far as he can go," or "Porter is as far as he can go;" and at page 198 he says McDowell said: "He has got as far as he can go," or "as far as he ought to go." The idea was Porter has got to stop where he is, and I want you to go around on the other road.

This evidence coming from the lips of General Patrick of my own State convinces me that when McDowell took King and fifteen thousand men and marched away, leaving Porter with only ten thousand men, saying "Porter has got as far as he can go," or "Porter has got as far as he ought to go," that he meant what he said and said what he meant; and that Porter and Colonel Locke and the others are correct when they say McDowell ordered Porter to stay where he was and told him it was "no place to fight a battle."

McDowell may swear till doomsday that he told Porter, "Put your forces in here," and that he expected that Porter would fight there; I shall not believe him. If it was the time and place for General Porter to fight, it was the time and place for General McDowell and General

King to fight. Either McDowell was a craven when he marched away at 1 p. m. that day, or he was wofully mistaken when he testified before that court-martial.

Fisher A. Baker, adjutant of the Eighteenth Massachusetts, was in Morell's division in the advance on the 29th of August. He says skirmishers were thrown out and there was firing all the afternoon, also artillery firing, and some men were killed; that he saw a heavy force in front all the afternoon.

General W. M. Graham was with Kearny the night of August 27; was ordered to march that night; it was so dark they could not, and at 10 o'clock halted for the night.

It will also be borne in mind that Generals Pope and McDowell, and officers of lesser rank than General Porter, were allowed to give their opinion that if Porter had moved forward and attacked that night the result would have been a complete victory for the Union army, and it was largely upon these opinions, based upon the assumption that Longstreet was not in the front of Porter, that the conviction was had. It will also be borne in mind that Porter was contending that a large force of the enemy was in his front at the time the 4.30 order was received and that a flank attack was impossible. Under these circumstances the following question was put to General Pope on his cross-examination:

Q. Bearing in mind the terms and tenor of the order of 4.30 p. m. of the 29th of August and its direction to the accused to attack the enemy's flank, and if possible his rear, and at the same time to keep up communication with General Reynolds on the right of the accused, please to inform the court whether, if it could have been foreseen at 4.30 p. m. that at the time when the accused should receive that order he would find himself in front of the enemy in large force in such a position that he could not outflank the enemy without severing his connection with General Reynolds on his right, would you, if that state of facts had been foreseen at the date of the reception of the order, have expected or anticipated obedience from the accused to the order according to its terms?

An objection was made, and the court ruled that the witness should not answer the question. The same ruling was made on this vital and all-important question all through the trial, so that while the prosecution was showing by opinions that if Porter had attacked a complete victory would have been won, assuming that Longstreet was not there, General Porter was refused the right to show that if Longstreet was there, as he claimed, not only would an attack have been suicidal, but that even Pope himself would not have expected an attempt to obey the order. The ruling was wrong, unjust, illegal, prejudicial.

Sir, gentlemen should keep in mind that on the trial of Fitz-John Porter it was charged and insisted that Jackson's force, twenty-two thousand, was the only enemy on the field, and that Fitz-John Porter, being on the flank of that force, was in duty bound to attack, "to march to the sound of the cannon," to the aid of Pope, who, it is claimed, was being defeated, and that therefore he was guilty. They should remember that on that trial it was insisted on and sworn to by Pope himself that Longstreet was not up and could not have been there. And there sat Porter insisting that Longstreet was there, and that his presence with twenty-five thousand men made an attack by him ruinous and a criminal waste of blood. On the assumption that Pope was correct, and on that alone, was Porter pronounced guilty. Now it is proved beyond question that Longstreet was there, that Porter was right and Pope all wrong. If justice has not fled to brutish beasts, let her now resume her seat.

Said the gentleman from Michigan:

There above the sulphurous smoke of that bloody field towered the majestic specter of America—

Which, being interpreted, means the majestic ghost of America—

calling through the bellowing of the guns "Fitz-John Porter, this way!"

I admire the beauty of the gentleman's language, the power of his eloquence, and the magic of his presence, but I deny that Fitz-John Porter was to respond to the call of any ghostly apparition. Battles are real and practical, and demand cool commanders, who are neither visionary nor controlled by specters. Had Fitz-John Porter that day listened to any voice other than that of judgment, wisdom, and duty, the specters of thousands of uselessly sacrificed soldiers would have risen from the bloody ground and, with skeleton fingers, dripping blood, pointing at him, would have cried, "Recreant to duty, regardless of life, you are our murderer!" and that vision would have haunted him down to his grave. It was his duty to save, not knowingly and uselessly to sacrifice life.

The same gentleman from Michigan says that—

McDowell swears that Porter, standing there upon the crest of the hill, pointing with his hand above the tops of the trees, said, "McDowell, we can not go in there anywhere without having a fight;" and that McDowell replied, "I understand that is what we are here for."

He would have us imply that McDowell was ready and willing to fight then and there and that Porter is responsible that no fight occurred.

How frivolous, how misleading the statement, how destitute of point or force, is demonstrated by the fact that almost immediately after that McDowell, burning and glowing, restless and raging for a combat with the enemy, as the gentleman would have us think, did what—attack that enemy in their immediate front? Get into a fight, which was what they were there for, as he would have us think? No, sir; but he took fifteen thousand of the twenty-five thousand men on that field and marched to the rear, and upon a circuitous route, that occupied the remainder of the day. There is no disputing this; and yet the gentleman would have us think and find that the subordinate was disobedient, while the superior officer who fled the field (if it was a duty incumbent on any one to fight there) is lauded as a hero and made a witness to degrade Porter for not doing what he himself declined to do; for not doing what McDowell thought not wise to do; for not doing that which General Porter subsequently discovered would have been perfectly ruinous to do; for not doing that which this board of inquiry say would not only have been "a great blunder" but "a great crime."

But the gentleman in his zeal and blind grasping for some straw upon which to found an argument against General Porter, quite unexpectedly stumbled upon the dispatch of General John Buford, and which, having been sent to Ricketts and forwarded to McDowell, was by him shown to General Porter between 12 and 1 o'clock. It is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY BRIGADE—9.30 a. m.

General RICKETTS: Seventeen regiments, one battery, and five hundred cavalry passed through Gainesville three-quarters of an hour ago on the Centreville road. I think this division should join our forces now engaged at once. Please forward this.

JOHN BUFORD,
Brigadier-General.

That dispatch made it perfectly plain to General Porter that Pope had once more blundered and miscalculated. It proved beyond all question that the falling back of Ricketts from Thoroughfare Gap the night before had allowed Longstreet to come through, and that notwithstanding the announcement in the joint order that Longstreet would be up by the night of the 30th or the morning of the 31st, Lee's army was there united and in the immediate front. The trouble was, not that Porter was slow, but that Lee and Longstreet were two whole days ahead of Pope's time.

And yet the gentleman from Michigan says that he does "not believe in the faithfulness of that report."

"I think that Buford was mistaken as to the hour," says the gentleman. Why, sir, the Buford dispatch was in writing, dated at 9.30 that morning, and unless borne on the wings of the hurricane direct to McDowell must have been written not later than 9.30 or 10 o'clock that morning. But as that dispatch, like a double-edged dagger, punctured the gentleman's argument, he was compelled to argue that Buford was false in his written dispatches. So he makes the assertion, and then goes off on a wild-goose chase after the person of General Longstreet riding on the saddle behind Stuart, who was looking him up.

Sir, even if Longstreet had not passed Gainesville in person at 9.30 a. m., it is no indication that his advanced divisions were not even then in front of Porter. But, sir, argument is not necessary in the face of this report signed by Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty, all Republicans, in which they say, among other things:

Such an attack under such circumstances would have been not only a great blunder, but, on the part of an intelligent officer, would have been a great crime.

And—

It is not possible that any court-martial could have condemned such conduct if it had been correctly understood. On the contrary, that conduct was obedient, subordinate, faithful, and judicious. It saved the Union army from disaster on the 29th of August.

We can but reach one conclusion if we will lay aside our prejudice and partisanship and act the part of the unbiased judge.

Sir, I am deeply pained to see such strained efforts to find arguments against General Porter. If none exist in the record, let us not travel outside and into the realms of guess or speculation, where we shall find ourselves groping in ignorance and doing great wrong. If it be possible that General Buford was mistaken one or two hours in the date of his 9.30 dispatch, it is more than probable that Pope was more than an hour out of the way in dating his 4.30 order. Such an error would be in "sweet accord" with his numerous egregious errors and contradictions.

I have, sir, but one word more. My love and admiration for the soldiers of this Republic are unbounded and beyond expression. There are more than a hundred thousand of them who are encamped in the bivouac of the dead whose silent voices come to us amid the busy cares of the day and appeal for justice to every soldier and plead for Fitz-John Porter. In the silent hours of the night do they come, and as we securely repose, relying on the care and infinite justice of God, they appeal to us to right this great wrong, and remove the undeserved stain that for twenty years has darkened the record of Fitz-John Porter and stained the military annals of the Republic.

Sir, I am aware how impossible it is to fully review this case in the brief time allowed me. But I repose confidence in this House and in its integrity and intelligence. In the name of justice, for the honor of our country, and in behalf of the thousands of soldiers who appeal to us for justice to their old comrade in arms, and whose confidence in his integrity, loyalty, and devotion has never been shaken, I ask for that most righteous verdict in this case which will have been rendered when this bill becomes a law.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield a minute or two of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, Major STEELE.

Mr. STEELE. I merely want to call attention to the question which I wished to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. He takes exceptions to my saying that these officers were sent for by General Porter. I want to quote from the testimony of General Sykes, one of those officers. It will be found on page 170 of the record in this case. He says:

About 10 p. m. on the 27th of August General Porter sent for me; we were then encamped at Warrenton Junction. In his tent I met General Morell, General Butterfield, and Capt. Drake De Kay. General Porter informed me that he had received an order by the hands of Capt. Drake De Kay directing his corps to march at 1 o'clock a. m. on the 28th.

On page 179 of the same record will be found the testimony of General Butterfield to the same effect in substance. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] states that an order was sent back to General Pope by Pope's own officers that he (Porter) could not move. I find no such record. There may be such, but I do not think there is. On the contrary, I find that General Butterfield testifies, as will be found on page 179 of the record, that General Porter sent two of his own officers to General Pope.

I will also read what General Sykes says about the possibility of moving on the night of the 27th of August. A large part of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has been directed to what General Sykes said. On page 173 of the record I find the following as the testimony of General Sykes:

Q. Are you to be understood as saying that had you received an order from General Porter to march at 1 o'clock a. m. on the 28th, with the knowledge you then had of the road and of the obstructions on it and the condition of the troops, you would not have obeyed it?

A. If I had received such an order from General Porter of course I would have obeyed it.

It makes a difference whose ox is gored.

Mr. LAIRD. Yes; but General Sykes says afterward in the same testimony that it would have been impossible for him to have obeyed such an order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I was not aware that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] asked me a question.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] had an hour and a half, and he repeatedly and persistently refused to allow himself to be interrupted.

Mr. STEELE. Of course I do not say there is no such testimony that Porter sent word by Pope's aids that he could not move. I would like very much for any gentleman to show any such testimony, and I do not think it can be done.

Now, in regard to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] that McDowell made a retrograde movement, I will say that there is no evidence at all to show it. On the contrary, under the discretion of the joint order McDowell distinctly says that "in order to facilitate and to carry out the intentions of General Pope, under the discretion given me, I will facilitate matters by moving King and Ricketts up to Sudley Springs," &c.

Mr. ROSECRANS. That is, to make the retrograde movement of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. STEELE. It was no retrograde movement; it was a movement against the enemy.

Mr. LAIRD. That is to say, you will promote McDowell for running away from the enemy, and say that Porter should be shot for doing the same thing.

Mr. STEELE. I say that there is no evidence of a retrograde movement.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I will ask the gentleman to read the evidence of Judge Patrick before the board of inquiry.

Mr. STEELE. I do not care one cent for what he said before the board of inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I have to request now that members will not interrupt me during the course of my remarks. With the material I have on hand I hardly think I shall consume the whole of the hour allotted to me under the rule. Therefore, at the conclusion of my remarks there will be sufficient time for me to make answer to any questions which gentlemen may see fit to propound to me.

If in the course of my remarks any gentleman may desire to question any of my statements or propositions, for the convenience of others as well as myself I request those gentlemen to bear such statements in mind or to make note of them, and when I shall have finished my regular remarks they may then ask me the questions that have occurred to them. I promise in advance to answer them as fully and fairly and as dispassionately as I may be able.

I approach the discussion of this case, Mr. Chairman, with many misgivings. It is a great and important question. There is a vast volume of evidence in the case—evidence taken before the court-martial as well as that taken before the commission appointed by President Hayes. I approach its consideration with greater hesitation in view of the statement made the other day by the gentleman from New York having charge of this bill [Mr. SLOCUM] when he said:

It has become apparent to me in this discussion that the people are entirely mistaken; and that no more profitable thing can be done than for Congress to sit here and tell the world how much they know about military matters. If the members of Congress would only tell Grant and Sherman and Schofield and other such men all they know about military matters you could dispense with the military men and abolish the Army.

Further on he said:

There was never such an absurdity perpetrated in any representative body as has been enacted here; for three hundred gentlemen knowing nothing about military matters to sit here and gravely discuss subjects about which they know nothing whatever and never can know.

If this ipse dixit of the gentleman represents the fact, then I repeat that I approach the consideration of this case with many misgivings. But I feel encouraged, Mr. Chairman, to offer a few desultory remarks on this bill since the same gentleman, in the course of his regular speech, said:

On Sherman's great march from Atlanta to the sea, when all knew that he had left his base of supplies and burned his bridges behind him, and all were in suspense as to his intentions, when few even of his own command knew the destination of the army in which they were serving, I have seen day after day private soldiers seated by the roadside on the line of march, with pocket-maps in their hands, eagerly and intelligently discussing the probable plans of their commander.

I feel the more encouraged to proceed with the discussion of this case in view of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] who has just completed his speech, for he informed us in the beginning that he, as a private soldier, proposed to enlighten the House with reference to this matter. True, that statement as to his rank was, but a few moments since, somewhat neutralized by his stating that he had issued thousands of orders. I do not question either of these statements. I simply present his own paradox, and let gentlemen take his statements for what they are worth. I do not think it follows because a man was a private soldier that he is not able to discuss this case fairly, conscientiously, and intelligently; and I am borne out in that conclusion by the very able argument in the interest of Fitz-John Porter made by the gentleman who announced himself in the beginning as a private soldier.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I repeat it now.

Mr. THOMAS. And it is—Greatly to your credit,

For you yourself have said it.

[Laughter.]

We are admonished here by the friends of Fitz-John Porter and of this bill that it is not properly a political question, and that political considerations should not enter into it. I grant you that that ought to be true; that in theory it is true, while in practice this has been, and is to-day, one of the most prominent political questions that has come before the American people since the close of the rebellion——

Mr. ROSECRANS. True.

Mr. THOMAS. And it is made expressly so by the friends and followers of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. ROSECRANS. No.

Mr. THOMAS. Ah! the gentleman's exclamation of "no" proves nothing. Look at the history of the past; look at the history of the present. Follow up the political lives and convictions of the men, with a few individual exceptions, who support Fitz-John Porter and this bill, and see what their political affiliations were and have always been. I say that if we put our feet on the Constitution of our country, turn our backs upon the legally constituted authorities, and determine in spite of the Constitution itself, in spite of our form of government, to invade the province of the judicial department of this Government, then I say we should free ourselves from all political bias, assume that we can properly and legitimately investigate the question, and then act on it as judges and not as politicians.

I do not care, in the discussion of this case, to go over all the evidence for or against Fitz-John Porter. Other gentlemen have taken it up and analyzed it most thoroughly; have discussed it elaborately; and therefore I shall content myself with a discussion of only admitted facts in this case—facts admitted on both sides.

In the first place, then, I deny the right of Congress, under the Constitution, to investigate this case or to pass upon it at all; and this attempt to override the decision of one of the constitutional tribunals of this country is in my opinion an absolute violation of the Constitution of the United States.

We have three co-ordinate branches of government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. It is for Congress to enact laws; for the courts to pass upon their constitutionality and punish the violations thereof; and for the Executive to execute the law as it is enacted and declared.

But we are gravely informed here by one gentleman advocating the passage of this bill that courts-martial are not courts in any proper sense; that they are not mentioned in the Constitution as a part of the judicial system of the United States. Let us see whether that is true; for the gentleman's statement, if it goes uncontradicted, will doubtless have some weight. Let us see whether that is true; and, in order that we may reach the matter properly, let us go to the Constitution itself. I read from Article III:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger. * * *

Then Congress has the right to establish inferior courts. It has the right under the law to establish courts-martial by statute, and courts-martial are authorized by the Articles of War, which have the force and effect of statutes. Therefore, inferior courts—inferior, I mean, to the Supreme Court of the United States—in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, have been established. That civil courts shall have no jurisdiction of offenses arising in time of war in the military and naval forces of the United States is expressly provided, as I have shown, in the Constitution. Therefore it negatively affirms that they may be prosecuted without indictment in the inferior or subordinate courts established by Congress. I suppose no one will deny the soundness of that proposition or the truth of my statement in reference to the matter.

Now, courts have been established and courts-martial have been authorized under the Constitution by Congress and have existed from the beginning of the Government. Fitz-John Porter was an officer in the United States Army, and was charged with violating the Articles of War, in being guilty of neglecting and refusing to obey the lawful commands of his superior officer. Those charges were preferred against him, and he was brought before a duly and constitutionally organized court-martial—was fully, fairly, and justly tried and convicted, and in compliance with the laws of the United States the finding of that court-martial was examined by the Secretary of War and approved by him. Ay, more than that, it was examined as the law required—for it is always the presumption of law that an officer charged with the performance of a duty discharges that duty—by Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and approved by him. It was, therefore, a finished fact, and the case had been tried as the Constitution and law required it should be. It had reached a final resting-place, had been rounded and completed by that co-ordinate branch of the Government to which it belonged.

I say, then, that since the Constitution of the United States in terms expressly prohibits the enactment of ex post facto laws, it must at least in principle prohibit Congress from passing retroactive laws having the effect of annulling the decision of a case by a co-ordinate branch of the Government equally powerful with itself. On that ground, therefore, I protest against the proposed action of the House in passing this bill.

But, sir, if it is to be discussed, and we see that it not only has been, but is to be still further, let us look at the case in the character of judges, which, in theory at least, we are. Let us for a moment free ourselves from political influences and sit clothed in ermine as spotless as that worn by any judges of the land.

Now, what are the admitted facts in this case? For it is proper that we should have them all before us, so that we may be able to determine the right or the wrong of the matter. First, there was a war of the rebellion, and during the war of the rebellion one subdivision of the armies of the United States was called the Army of Virginia. It is admitted on all hands that at the time in question Maj. Gen. John Pope was properly and legally in command of that army. It is admitted that the Fifth Corps was a part of the Army of Virginia, and that Fitz-John Porter, then a major-general of United States volunteers, was in command of that corps. It is admitted on both sides that Fitz-John Porter, then a major-general of United States volunteers, and while in command of the Fifth Army Corps, was ordered by Maj. Gen. John Pope, then in command of the Army of Virginia, to move his command at a certain time and to be at a certain place mentioned in the order by a certain hour. It is further admitted that Fitz-John Porter there and then failed to comply with that order. It is admitted that for this disobedience of orders and his conduct at the time charges and specifications were filed against him by a party authorized by law to file such charges. It is also admitted that a general court-martial was ordered and convened by proper constitutional authority to try Fitz-John Porter on the charges and specifications then filed. It is further admitted that said court-martial was a lawful and constitutional tribunal; that their proceedings were legal and constitutional. That court-martial was composed of the following distinguished officers of the United States Army: Maj. Gen. David Hunter, United States volunteers, president of the court; Maj. Gen. E. A. Hitchcock, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. Rufus King, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. B. M. Prentiss, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. James B. Ricketts, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. Silas Casey, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. James A. Garfield, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. N. B. Buford, United States volunteers; Brig. Gen. J. P. Slough, United States volunteers; and Col. J. Holt, Judge-Advocate-General.

It is shown by the evidence taken before the court-martial, as well as by that taken before the famous Schofield commission, that Fitz-John Porter was at the time of the trial entirely satisfied with the personnel of the court, as is shown by his own statements and admissions. It is admitted that Fitz-John Porter was fully heard by, and ably defended before, the court-martial, as shown by the fact that the trial lasted forty-five days. It is admitted that the case was fully examined both by the Secretary of War, who approved the findings and verdict of the court-martial, and by the President of the United States, who also approved its verdict and findings, and that, too, when all of the facts and circumstances of the case were fresh in their minds, and when their official lungs were full of the very air by which the case was surrounded. And this is the first time, Mr. Chairman, this morning is the first time, I have ever heard it questioned that the President failed to examine or had not examined fully the case, and that statement comes now as second-hand evidence, and not as evidence that would be considered in any court, and has not strength, solidity, or pungency enough to overturn that legal presumption that an officer always discharges his lawful and constitutional duty.

These, then, sir, are the admitted facts in the case in favor of the Government and against Fitz-John Porter. Now, what reasons are presented for offering this bill, having as its object the setting aside of the findings and sentence of the court-martial? These are important questions, and afford an appropriate field of inquiry. It is claimed that a corps commander has certain discretion in the execution of the orders of his superior officer, and that Fitz-John Porter only exercised a proper discretion in refusing or neglecting to execute the orders of General Pope, his superior officer. This, then, is the first reason offered why we should set aside the proceedings of the court-martial.

The second reason is that a commission appointed by President Hayes reported that injustice had been done to Fitz-John Porter by the court-martial; that the findings and verdict were wrong, and that the approval thereof by the Secretary of War and the President of the United States was erroneous, and therefore that the whole proceedings ought to be set aside, and Fitz-John Porter reinstated to his position in the Army, clothed with all the rank and power of an officer of the United States Army.

It is further claimed that this position is strengthened by the fact that General Grant has written a letter stating that he believes injustice was done to Porter; and fourth, and finally, it is urged by the gentleman from New York, General SLOCUM, as a reason why this bill ought to pass that General Garfield, a member of the court-martial and subsequently President of the United States, was the author of the movement for the restoration of Fitz-John Porter.

I believe, sir, that this is a fair statement of the grounds and of the reasons urged by the friends of Fitz-John Porter, happily not a general now, why the bill should pass. We are sitting here now as a court of appeals, as a court of last resort, and it behooves us to consider the case fairly, fully, and dispassionately, and it is right and proper that the rights and interests of our Government should be considered as well as the rights and interests of Fitz-John Porter.

The presumption of law is always that courts constitutionally authorized, courts having jurisdiction of certain classes of cases, in trying and deciding a cause have jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the person; and the presumption is also that the proceedings and judgments of the court are regular, lawful, and just. I presume that no gentleman having any care for his reputation as a lawyer or for his word will question the soundness of these legal propositions. These being admitted and applied to this case, the friends of the bill are compelled to produce sufficient reasons to show affirmatively that the judgment of the court-martial was erroneous, unlawful, and unjust.

Let us examine their case as they have presented it, and see whether their reasons are well founded and whether they have shown affirmatively either that the court was not properly organized, that it did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter and person, or that the evidence did not warrant their findings.

First, and as a part of the res gestæ, it must be remembered that there was a great rebellion raging against the constituted authorities of the Government at the time of the commission of the crimes alleged against Fitz-John Porter. That the Army of the United States was confronted at the very time by the organized army of the insurgents. That in order to make the United States Army effective it was absolutely necessary to maintain discipline—not discipline alone, but military discipline. The neglect and refusal of a subordinate officer to obey implicitly the commands of a superior officer in the face of the enemy is an infraction of discipline and a violation of military law. Friends of Fitz-John Porter having admitted that General Pope's orders to Porter were not obeyed, have they shown any exercise of that proper, legitimate discretion claimed for Fitz-John Porter as a sufficient excuse? I claim that they have not. And upon what ground do I make the statement? It is urged upon the part of the friends of this measure that it was a dark night, some of the witnesses testifying that it rained, that the road was crowded with wagons, that it was impossible for him to move along that road, and therefore that he exercised only a proper discretion in neglecting and refusing to obey the order as it was given to him.

An investigation of the facts shows, however, that the order was received at 9.40 o'clock p. m. The order itself shows he was to move at 1 o'clock a. m., and that he must be at a point mentioned in the order at daylight. Now, there was from 9.40 p. m. until 1 o'clock a. m. in which he had an opportunity to clear the road of the wagon-train that stood in the way and prevented, as he claimed, the movement of his troops. Three hours and twenty minutes to get a wagon-train off the road. Is there a soldier here who does not know from his own experience that an hour, ay, half an hour, was enough to put every one of those wagons into park, and if not into park, into the woods, to have removed them from that road? But was he driven to that necessity? Not by any means. It is a fact that very near the camp, and running very nearly parallel to the road, was the railroad track. True it was, there were trains passing occasionally on that track. But most of the time the railroad track was free and clear. And it is not claimed that Porter attempted to move his troops along that railroad track and thereby obey the order.

Is that all? The evidence shows further there was a road on either side of this railroad track. And no one claims there was any obstruction on those roads; and it is not claimed he attempted to move on either side of the railroad track.

Then how can it be claimed here that he was exercising a proper discretion in failing to comply with the order of his superior officer, when the order on its face admonished him of the fact that it was very important he should be at that point by daylight?

Then, sir, that part of the case has not been made out by Fitz-John Porter. Then, how can we with propriety discuss, as applied to this case, the question as to what a legitimate, lawful, and proper discretion of a military officer is in disobeying or modifying the orders of his superior officer? I will guarantee there can not be produced a military authority of any standing in the world that authorizes a subordinate military officer to either modify or refuse to obey a lawful, pointed, positive, explicit order of his superior officer?

Ah! but they say if it is physically impossible for him to perform it then he is excused. That is true; but it is not shown that there was any physical impossibility about it at all. For the evidence discloses the fact that at the very time when Fitz-John Porter moved, starting at 3 o'clock, wagons were on the road then, and that in spite of those wagons he did move down there and reached the place about 10 o'clock. Then that part of the case has not been made out. Let us see then whether the other reasons urged are enough to influence this body to set aside this legal constitutional judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

It is claimed that a commission appointed by the President of the United States investigated this case fully in time of peace and when the sound and tumult of war were not ringing in their ears; when the passions of men were cool; when their judgments were clear, and when they were able to decide upon the case without fear, favor, or prejudice. And we were informed by the gentleman from New York having charge of this bill [Mr. SLOCUM] that it is folly for us to attempt to try this case; that it has already been tried by a military commission, and that our duty, and all we have to do, is to comply with the recommendations of that commission.

What kind of a commission was this? In describing it I shall do myself the pleasure, with his permission, of quoting the language of the distinguished lawyer and soldier from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], who so happily pointed out the features and described the form and complexion of this same commission:

> The Schofield board, so called, was a board created by no law. It had no legal status. It was known to no law. It was responsible to no law. If they took an oath it was an extrajudicial oath. They had no authority to take an oath. They could take no binding oath. Their finding was an extrajudicial finding. It was merely personal advice of three amiable gentlemen to the President, which he did not see fit to adopt. The board had none of the power of a court. It could not compel the attendance of witnesses. It could not administer a valid oath. It could not enforce its processes by attachment for contempt. It could not prosecute a single witness for perjury if every word he uttered was a lie from beginning to end. It had not one single attribute of a court, either to compel the attendance of witnesses, to swear them, to examine them, or to punish them. This was the character of the tribunal, if we may call it a tribunal, upon whose report the Military Committee asks you to reverse the finding and the judgment of the court-martial.

It is made manifest by the majority report of the Military Committee that this commission, this late Schofield investigation, was held at West Point, and it is urged as a reason why we should adopt that in preference to a judgment found here in the city of Washington, the seat of government, that it is peaceful, quiet, and pleasant, and that no jarring influences surrounded the court. That brings to my mind a question which has entered very largely into this case, the question of West Point and its influences. From some of the speeches delivered here one would suppose that Maj. Gen. John Pope was the defendant, and that it devolved upon the Congress of the United States to vindicate him. I want to say one word in reply to the vile slings that have been hurled at a man whose reputation for valor, for gallantry, and ability stands above that of any man who has assailed him here. Who is General Pope? He was born at the seat of government of the Territory of Illinois, at Kaskaskia. I am proud of the fact that he was born and brought up in my district. His father was the first Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Illinois, and the first United States judge of the Territory and of the State of Illinois. He sat and presided with wisdom, patriotism, and judgment over the United States court of that State for thirty years.

Ay, who is John Pope? He was educated at the Military Academy at West Point and graduated with honor. He was appointed an officer in the Army of the United States in 1846. He was three times brevetted for gallantry on the field in the war with Mexico. He has never turned his back upon the foe, whether foreign or domestic. He has never quailed in the face of the enemy. Although he has sometimes met with defeat, it was because of the insubordination and treachery and to my mind the unqualified treason of just such officers as Fitz-John Porter.

And yet gentlemen come here and claim that he ought to be blamed because he did not succeed, when the very man in whose interest they are pleading was the man who sulked in his tent like the Grecian warrior of old before the walls of Troy, because forsooth a man who graduated at West Point before he did and was higher in rank than was he had been made his superior officer.

That is not the only case where men sulked in their tents during the war because they were not promoted to important commands in preference to some other men to whom they claimed to be superior.

Let me refer to an event in history. I filled but a humble position in the United States Army during the last war, but in the positions filled by me, beginning with that of private soldier, I tried to do my duty. I remember some of the facts that occurred within my own experience. I sometimes studied maps, as described by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] in his speech.

I remember the 22d of July, 1864, when the Army of the Tennessee was driven back by the wild untamable forces of Hood's army before Atlanta, when the brave James B. McPherson fell as he was gallantly leading his forces. I remember when the Seventeenth Army Corps was being driven back, its field hospital and army trains having been captured, and consternation had taken possession of the whole corps, and defeat was staring in the face every soldier in that army, and a tremor went through the frame of every man for fear that all the ground gained in the one hundred and one days of our march from Buzzard Roost to Atlanta would be lost. At that moment, at that awful and critical moment, there was a soldier who was born in the county adjoining that in which John Pope was born, who had been a friend of his boyhood, who had served with him in the Mexican war and also in that war, came down as the Assyrian came down, with his coal-black hair and his flaming eyes blazing with the patriotism and heroism of his soul, and took command of the Army of the Tennessee and hurled back the forces of Hood and turned defeat into victory. That man was John A. Logan. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Then there was sulking in the tents of some other men. Although General Logan had saved the army from defeat, although he had taken command of it when our troops were in full retreat, and although he had rescued it and had gained a most magnificent victory by the force of his own genius, still there was sulking in tents, for he had the bar-sinister across his escutcheon of not having graduated at West Point. In the face of that grand service, in the face of his service in Mexico, in the face of the fact that he had been wounded at Shiloh and at Fort Donelson, and in the face of the fact that he had led his corps to victory and had saved that army, a West Pointer was put over his head and he was deprived of the golden spurs he had won on that field.

Did John A. Logan sulk in his tent? No, sir.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask——

Mr. THOMAS. I decline to be interrupted. I will tell you why General Logan did not sulk in his tent when another was placed in command over him; I will tell you why he did not send fault-finding, quibbling, disloyal dispatches to another officer. John A. Logan was a volunteer soldier who entered the service to endeavor to save his country from the hands of traitors, and he was ready to fight wherever he might be placed. And this was proven by the fact that on the 28th day of July, just afterward, he led his own corps into the fight on the right of Atlanta and there won another magnificent victory.

Not so with Fitz-John Porter, who had been educated at West Point and under its influence had been led to think and believe that fidelity to one of their own number, fidelity to one of the graduates of that institution, was a higher, broader, greater, and more binding duty than fidelity to his commanding officer and to his country. Every one who has studied the question knows the influence of educational establishments.

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that my time be extended, as has been done in the case of every other man who has requested it.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I hope it may be done by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. How much additional time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. THOMAS. I will ask for thirty minutes.

There was no objection, and the additional time was accordingly granted.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the committee for its courtesy.

To follow out the idea I had in my mind, I will say that educational establishments have ever regarded their graduates as their children. They stand up for them from the time they enter to their death. There is always a community of interest as well on the part of the institution in its corporate capacity as on the part of the men who graduate from it.

And so you will find that West-Pointers come back to the fidelity of other years and to the support of Fitz-John Porter. They are the men who fear now that the high character of that institution is being damaged by this record against one of its graduates, and therefore they want to wipe it out.

Ah, do they ever come to the front in trying to wipe any stain from the record of a volunteer soldier? I have yet to hear of the first case of that kind. But who is it that urges the passage of this bill? Who are the men? What are their political affiliations? For in spite of all we can do, we find there are political considerations.

But before speaking of that I will refer to another matter to which my notes call my attention. They say that General Grant has recently written a letter in which he says that he has investigated the case and changed his mind; and they therefore urge that by reason of his great position, his admitted military genius, and the fact of his having been the President of the United States, his having changed his mind ought to be a sufficient excuse for other people changing theirs. When General Grant voluntarily comes in and puts himself in the place of a witness in this case, he must be measured by the same rules and gauges by which other witnesses are measured. His evidence is only entitled to the consideration to which his reasons may show it to be entitled. Now, the letter written by General Grant, and introduced in the majority report, is not the only one he has ever written; and by way of answering this charge of malignity on the part of Major-General Pope against Fitz-John Porter I will call attention to the following letter, dated Washington, April 18, 1874, when, mark you, U. S. Grant was President:

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1874.

MR. PRESIDENT: It is no doubt known to you that General Fitz-John Porter claims to have procured evidence since his trial, not attainable at the time, which would either acquit him of the crime of which he stands convicted or greatly modify the findings and sentence of the court-martial before which he was tried, and that he has embodied in a printed pamphlet the kind and character of this evidence and what he expects to establish by it, together with an appeal for a rehearing of his case.

It is widely asserted by those who sympathize with him, and probably believed by many who have no personal interest in his case, that influences hostile to him have restrained you from examining this statement of his case, and have thus worked great injustice by preventing the Executive from considering statements or evidence which might vindicate his character.

It is needless to say to you that I have never used any influence with you, personal or other, to prevent the investigation of his statements, nor even intimated to you in any manner that I objected to any action you might think proper to take in the matter.

Nevertheless, as I do not wish even to seem to consent to any additional misconceptions concerning me or my action in this case, I beg (if you have not already done so) that you will yourself, Mr. President, examine as fully into the question as you think justice or mercy demands; or that you will order a board of competent officers of high rank, unconnected with the armies or transactions involved, to investigate fully the statements of this new evidence made by General Porter, and report to you what, if any, bearing it would have upon the findings and sentence of his court-martial, even if it could be fully established.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE, Brigadier-General, U. S. A.

General U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States.

Does that show that General Pope was pursuing this man; that there was any malignity in his heart; that he was not willing that justice should be done to Fitz-John Porter? I think every fair-minded man must answer that the contrary appears; that General Pope begged that the case might be investigated, so that justice might be done. Let us see what General Grant says in answer to that letter, for General Grant wrote another letter than the one presented here by Fitz-John Porter in his own behalf:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., May 9, 1874.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of the 18th of April, in regard to your position in the matter of a rehearing of the Fitz-John Porter court-martial, was duly received. You are under the apprehension that I had not fully examined the case, or rather that the public so thought, and that you had used means to prevent me from giving the subject fair consideration.

In reply I will make two emphatic statements: First, to the best of my recollection I have never had but one letter from you on this subject prior to the one I am now answering, and that simply contained the request that if I contemplated reopening the case I examine both sides. I read during the trial the evidence and the final findings of the court, looking upon the whole trial as one of great importance, and particularly so to the Army and Navy. When General Porter's subsequent defense was published, I received a copy of it and read it with care and attention, determined if he had been wronged and I could right him I would do so. My conclusion was that no new facts were developed that could be fairly considered, and that it was of doubtful legality whether by the mere authority of the Executive a rehearing could be given.

Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

General JOHN POPE, U. S. A.

True copies:

C. S. ILSLEY,
Captain and Aid-de-Camp.

A MEMBER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. THOMAS. "Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C., May 9, 1874."

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, not to be taken out of his time.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not yield. I have only a few moments remaining.

Mr. BELFORD. This is not be be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. THOMAS. But it must come out of my time; and I object to being interrupted.

It was claimed here by the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. SLOCUM] that Garfield had put this movement on foot, was the author of this bill. The gentleman said substantially, if not emphatically, that if Garfield were living he would doubtless support this bill. That was the inference. Let us see whether that is true or not. Out of his own mouth shall he be judged:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: Accept my thanks for your very interesting letter of the 2d instant in reference to the Fitz-John Porter case. The facts you relate are so entirely in accordance with my own understanding of the case that I shall be glad to make use of them in case I speak on that subject. It would add force to the case if you are willing that your name should be used, but of course I would not do this without your consent. Any other memoranda you may have or are pleased to make will be received with thanks. The Schofield board have recommended and the House Committee on Military Affairs have adopted the astounding proposition to pass a law annulling and setting aside as void the lawful sentence of a court-martial executed more than sixteen years ago. Of course they thereby virtually condemn the court and President Lincoln. It seems to me the very extreme to which party passion can go. They will never pass the bill without such a review of history as will enlighten the people afresh on the most disgraceful portion of our military history. Thanking you again for your letter,

I am, very truly, yours,

J. A. GARFIELD.

Hon. ALFRED E. LEE,
United States Consul-General, Frankfort-on-the-Main.

Here is an answer to the charge of the gentleman from New York that Garfield would have supported this measure. There was also a letter from General Garfield read by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], addressed to the late Major-General Cox, which is a complete and perfect answer to the charge that Garfield favored or would favor this bill.

But let us see who are supporting this bill and urging the re-appointment of Fitz-John Porter. It is the followers of McClellan, whose removal filled the heart of Fitz-John Porter with venom and hatred. Who was McClellan? He was the man who, after he was displaced, was taken up by the "Copperheads" and the "Sons of Liberty" and the men who were opposed to putting down the rebellion, and run as a candidate for President against Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BRUMM. Put up by the men in favor of an armistice with the enemy.

Mr. THOMAS. Who else are supporting this bill? A great number of the men who come up here now and propose by their votes to sustain Fitz-John Porter, who propose to cast a shadow of disgrace on the memory of Abraham Lincoln, who propose thereby to dishonor Edwin M. Stanton and the members of the court-martial, are the men who stood in the rebel ranks, arrayed against their country and their country's flag, shouting, "Hurrah for McClellan."

As then, so now, we find the same men following Little Mac and Fitz-John Porter. And I ask whether it is fair for these men who had no part or parcel in maintaining the discipline of the United States Army, and did nothing to maintain the Government which was saved by the efforts of the good Union people of the country, to come here and champion Fitz-John Porter's cause. It comes with poor grace from those men who were opposed to the war, whether south or north of Mason and Dixon's line—I mean the Sons of Liberty and the cowardly Copperheads of the North, who were infamously and infinitely worse than the men who stood before us fighting for what they believed to be right. I repeat, it comes with poor grace from them now to come in here and try to turn back the pages of history and wipe out the records of the gallant men who passed this judgment at the time, with all the facts and all the circumstances and all the necessities of the case fully upon them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the name of Abraham Lincoln, in the name of that court, in the name of the great war Secretary, Edwin M. Stanton, in the name of the men who fell in battle on the 29th, as shown by the evidence taken by this military commission itself, I protest against the passage of this bill. I protest in the name of the men who fell because Fitz-John Porter failed to come to their rescue while they were fighting during the livelong day and bleeding and dying. I protest against the passage of this bill in the name of the widows whose homes were made desolate because of the treachery of Fitz-John Porter. In the name of the orphan children who still mourn the fathers who fell on that field, I protest against the passage of this bill. I protest against it in the name of our country and her history. I protest against it in the name of patriotism and loyalty. I protest against it for the further reason that it is making treason, disobedience of orders, and insubordination in the Army honorable, and while it makes them honorable it puts the brand of condemnation upon the record of the men who saved and preserved this a nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. I want to know for my own guidance whether his judgment in the Fitz-John Porter case is better than the judgment of the greatest soldier this world has seen from the time of Julius Cæsar.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman refer to Fitz-John Porter or to Ulysses S. Grant?

Mr. BELFORD. I say that General Grant is the greatest general this world has seen from the time of Julius Cæsar, and he has certified to the country that this judgment is unjust and ought to be reversed.

Mr. THOMAS. It is admitted that General Grant is the greatest general since that time.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped and believed when we entered on the discussion of this case that it was not a political question. In the progress of the discussion I had hoped the fact would be demonstrated that this was not a political question, and that the Representatives of the people would sit in their judicial capacity, entirely free of all prejudice and bias resulting from political association. But the gentleman who has just preceded me has disclosed the animus of the opposition to the pending measure. It is that it is not treason against the Government with which Fitz-John Porter is charged, but treason alleged against Pope, and therefore this House is to divide upon a question involving the character, involving the rights, of an American citizen as partisans between Porter and Pope. If that is the attitude the case assumes, then I say we, as Representatives of the people, should let them fight out their personal battle between themselves, while we should look simply to the reputation of a man whose character up to the 27th day of August, 1862, as has been admitted by every man who has spoken on this subject, was without stain and without blemish.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. FOLLETT. I want to say simply this, that while the Representatives on the side of the question which I propose to discuss have scarcely interrupted any gentleman speaking on the other side, there have been almost continuous speeches of gentlemen of the other side interjected into the remarks of those who have been speaking on the side which I advocate.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I wish to ask the gentleman one question on the point which he is now discussing. Will he permit me to ask it?

Mr. FOLLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has not General Pope been unnecessarily attacked by the other side in this debate, and has not his defense in this debate been caused by the fact that gentlemen who are defending Fitz-John Porter on this floor could not seem to do it without attempting to asperse the character of other men who, whatever may have been their ability in war, fought faithfully under the flag of our country, and who have never had the stain of treason cast on them? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is not the question.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say again that under the guise of asking a question gentlemen upon the other side are continually interjecting their speeches into the debate when gentlemen favoring this bill are upon the floor.

I will now answer the question, in so far as it was a question. I for one shall not attack the character of General Pope. I do not propose to say of Pope anything that he has not said of himself. On the contrary, I propose to confine myself in this discussion to the record, for I know nothing about this controversy, and I want to know nothing about it outside of the record that was made before the court-martial.

When I became a member of this body, knowing that this question must come before it, and believing that it was a question of vital importance to the people of the United States, I investigated this case as carefully as I could from my training and habits, and also from my ability, such as it is, to scrutinize testimony; and I reached just the conclusion that has been reached by most men, at least those who have impartially examined the testimony, that upon that testimony no man should have been convicted of any crime whatever. And further than that, sir, if General Porter was guilty as alleged, he ought not to be living to-day to be asking at the hands of the American Congress the redress which, if he was not guilty, it is our right and duty to give.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that we have no power to act in this case. If there is any line of party demarkation upon this question, I have simply this to say: that the party to which I have the honor to belong has always believed that the military should be subordinate to the civil power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And especially is that so when one occupying the position which Fitz-John Porter has once occupied has performed the services for the Government which Fitz-John Porter once performed, did the duties required of him, not simply efficiently and with ability, but with a zeal and alacrity almost unknown in the Army up to that hour. I say that when a man of that kind and of that character has been tried and convicted it is not simply the right but it is the duty of every member of Congress to scan that record with close scrutiny and ascertain whether that conviction was predicated upon such testimony as ought to impeach the character of a citizen once occupying the high position which he occupied. Why, Mr. Chairman, at the very outset of this session of Congress, when word came that an American citizen had been tried in an English court, and that having been tried he had been convicted, and there was doubt in the public mind of his having been granted a fair and impartial trial, the American Congress without a dissenting voice passed a resolution asking the executive department of the Government to urge a suspension of that sentence until we had an opportunity to investigate the character of the trial and ascertain whether or not that American citizen had been condemned unjustly. To-day, Mr. Chairman, when Fitz-John Porter, with the bright record conceded to him, knocks at the door of this Congress and asks us to do just what we asked might be done in the case of O'Donnell, the convicted American citizen under English law, we find men objecting, and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that he had done those services and performed those duties which wrote his name upon American history in indelible letters, not merely as a general of ability and of courage, but as a patriot without spot and without blemish.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we find in the discussions which have taken place by gentlemen who oppose this measure that their claim is that the court that re-examined this case was not an authorized tribunal; that it was not in fact a court judicially constituted. We are told that the men who testified before that court could not have been prosecuted for perjury. What do we care how it was constituted, so they present us with the facts upon which we can act? A complete answer to the claim that no witness could be prosecuted for perjury for testimony given before the re-examining board is found in the fact that no prosecution for perjury was ever instituted against any witness who testified in the trial before the original court-martial. Yet it is apparent from the great conflict in the testimony that some of the witnesses must have perjured themselves upon that trial. Who doubts it? I think, Mr. Chairman, that a man who will lie at all will lie whether he be under oath or not under oath, and there is not in this country a court in which you can not impeach the character of a witness on the ground that he is a constitutional liar and therefore can not be believed on oath.

Prosecutions for perjury, forsooth, to determine the character of testimony submitted upon a hearing or investigation of any question! I am totally indifferent as to whether or not Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty were the three men that the gentleman who has preceded me refers to as constituting exactly the court that he says General Pope wanted organized for the purpose of reinvestigating this matter. I care not whether the men that they called were under oath or not under oath. They took an abundance of testimony; the Government was represented; both sides brought all the witnesses they desired to bring before that court. They reinvestigated the question at issue; having done so and made their report, that report is to me of as much validity and importance as a guide for my action here as a member of this House as it would be if it had been a court organized under all the forms of law and with all the solemnities of the woolsack accompanying it. What we want to know here is simply what are the facts, and knowing them, our duty as members of this Congress is clearly defined and marked out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what was the character of the testimony upon which Fitz-John Porter was convicted? Where was the weight of testimony? Gentlemen say that it is our duty to sustain the action of that court-martial unless satisfied that that action was clearly wrong. So it is. But in ascertaining whether that action was right or wrong what is our duty? We are to make an investigation of that testimony; for we have all of it that was before the court-martial. And I have yet to learn that there is a sacredness and a solemnity about a court-martial that its proceedings are to be binding and conclusive upon us so that we cannot investigate them.

I say that the members of that court-martial were bound, if regardful of the duties which they had to perform, to convict Fitz-John Porter only in case the testimony against him admitted of no reasonable doubt of his guilt. That is the rule, sir, that applies in every case of a criminal character; and Fitz-John Porter was charged with the highest crime. Applying this rule, applying the rule applicable in every case of a judicial character unless it be a court-martial—about them I know very little, and I do not want to know very much—but applying these rules, how stands his case? Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to examine a few of the facts. I have said I wanted to call your attention to the character of the testimony that was permitted to be given upon this trial. Allusion has been made to the testimony of a witness, T. C. H. Smith, a gentleman whom I know very well, who was evidently carried off his feet and off the position which he naturally and properly should have assumed as simply a witness. He gives this testimony before that court, and its very admission shows, as it seems to me, the animus of the prosecution of this case:

> After my tent was pitched and I had had something to eat, I went over to General Pope and reported to him briefly what I had done in regard to the ammunition. I then said to him: "General, I saw General Porter on my way here." Said he, "Well, sir." I said, "General, he will fail you." "Fail me," said he; "what do you mean? What did he say?" Said I, "It is not so much what he said, though he said enough; he is going to fail you." These expressions I repeat. I think I remember them with exactness, for I was excited at the time from the impression that had been made upon me. Said General Pope, "How can he fail me? He will fight where I put him; he will fight where I put him;" or, "He must fight where I put him; he must fight where I put him"—one of these expressions. This General Pope said with a great deal of feeling and impetuously, and perhaps overbearingly, and in an excited manner. I replied in the same way, saying that I was certain that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor; that I would shoot him that night, so far as any crime before God was concerned, if the law would allow me to do it.
> I speak of this to show the conviction that I received from General Porter's manner and expressions in that interview.

A court-martial trying a man upon a charge of crime admitting conversation between third parties away from the case without the hearing of the accused; and then not what he said but the manner of saying it! A court-martial receiving such testimony is something so high that the American Congress can not reach it to rectify the wrong it has done! Who ever heard upon a trial of a civil suit, where the rules of law were administered, of conversations between third parties being admitted as testimony upon which a verdict could be rendered? And further than that, who ever heard of a man being convicted upon the manner of his expression and not upon what he had said? This is a great mind-reader, who gets into the thoughts of a man's heart not only by what he says but simply by the manner of saying it. And conviction is had not upon what a man did but upon his manner of speech. The thing for Fitz-John Porter to do is perhaps to rid himself of a feeling that I should imagine might be natural when he encounters a man of that character, and avoid being convicted of treason because he might forget to speak with all the deference of a suppliant to a man who chances for the time being to come from his superior officer.

One thing further. After that court-martial had repeatedly admitted the testimony of witnesses as to what was their opinion of orders on behalf of the prosecution, the same questions when they were repeated by the defence were ruled out, the court deciding against their admissibility. That same court-martial had one of its members come down—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said yesterday his testimony extended only to a half page or the third of a page—come down from his seat as a member of that court and testify on behalf of the Government; and that too in rebuttal, where there was no opportunity to reply to the testimony that he had given. Rebuttal upon a point of great significance and vital importance. It was simply the question of what occurred upon the eventful 29th day of August. If there is any rule of law known to the administration of justice in this country and in every State, it is that the judge that tries a case shall not only be impartial, but that he shall not be a witness in the case he sits upon. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, there are very few lawyers, in my section of the country at least, who, when it is necessary that they should testify in a case of which they have charge, will afterwards have anything to do with the conduct of the case. But here is a judge, an honorable man—I hope so, I do not know him, neither do I know Fitz-John Porter—and I say there is not in all these charges that have been made against Fitz-John Porter anything to compare so far as the sense of American justice is concerned with a judge coming down to testify in a case that is being tried before him. [Applause.]

Ah, but we are told that this is a matter of frequent occurrence in courts-martial. If that be so, then all the more reason for standing by the doctrine of the fathers, that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power, and we will teach them justice, right, and the proper administration of the law.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but being a new member and not knowing much about the subject, I would like to ask him if the gentleman who opened this case and laid out the ground on which he expects to sustain his position in favor of relieving Fitz-John Porter did not in the most emphatic language tell us that we, being civilians, did not know anything about the case, that we did not have the capability of knowing anything about it, and that it was the most sublime humbug for this House to attempt to determine it?

Mr. FOLLETT. And I agree entirely with what the gentleman said, and I want to say that I thank God that we do not know about it, if that is the character of it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If you and I do not know anything about it, how can we consistently vote to set aside the verdict of a court-martial which, being composed of military men according to the standard laid down by the gentleman who opened this case, did know something about it and did decide it?

Mr. FOLLETT. I have undertaken to say just exactly how I do know something about it. I have read the testimony.

Mr. MILLIKEN. So have many of us here.

Mr. FOLLETT. And when I read the testimony in a trial of a case it is not necessary for me to ask anybody what in my opinion should be the proper judgment to be rendered upon it, especially when I know that the testimony I have before me is all the testimony that there is in the case. But I say again, as I have before said, that when the rights of an American citizen who had stood high and made a fair and honorable name are to be assailed and trampled down by such a trial and such testimony, I at least, as one of the Representatives in the American Congress, will by my voice and by my vote interpose against that wrong and that injustice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GIBSON. I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] will not allow these interruptions.

Mr. FOLLETT. I want to say a word or two more right here. The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. THOMAS] has taken special pains to denounce West Point, to denounce the men who have received a military education, to denounce men whose training has been in the line of military science and duty, to denounce the men, I assert here and now, who led to victory in the last war the forces upon the part of the Union. I do not mean to say that there were not gallant volunteer officers. I do not mean to say that there were not gallant men in that contest who never had received a military education. But the men who stood at the front, whose judgment was relied upon, who led the forces of the North to victory, were men who graduated at West Point. And if we had not had them there would not be to-day the rejoicing over the victories of our armies that it is our pride to be enabled to participate in.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Many MEMBERS. Order! Order!

Mr. MILLIKEN. Were not the majority of the members of that court-martial graduates of West Point?

Mr. FOLLETT. I should be glad, Mr. Chairman, to be interrupted all the time if it were not for the fact that we are understood to be dividing the time upon this discussion. We on this side of the House are entitled to only one-half of the time, and to permit gentlemen on the other side to occupy half of our time and all of their own in this discussion would be hardly fair.

I want to allude to another thing which was stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in this discussion yesterday. He read a telegram from General McClellan to General Porter, and said that that telegram upon its face showed just the opinion that McClellan had of General Porter at the time the telegram was sent. Now, I want to say just what General McClellan said about that when he was under oath, when there was all the sanctity and solemnity of an oath, upon which they say he could have been prosecuted for perjury. But I happen to be one who believes that General McClellan, under oath or not under oath, could never speak anything but the truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Here is what he said, the reason he gave for sending any dispatch:

I sent it in accordance with a request of the President of the United States, who sent for me on that day and told me that he had understood that there was an unkind feeling on the part of the Army of the Potomac toward General Pope, and requested me to use my personal influence to correct it by telegraphing either to General Porter or to any other of my friends there. I told him—

Now, mark what General McClellan said—

I told him that I did not consider it necessary, but was perfectly willing to do it. I had no doubt then in my own mind that the Army of the Potomac and all connected with it would do their duty, without there being any necessity for any action on my part.

Yet we have an argument here, predicated upon that dispatch, that McClellan knew, that the President knew in advance, that Fitz-John Porter intended treason, and did not intend to obey the orders of his commanding officer.

I say now and here that the spirit of every order sent to General Porter was obeyed, if not in the letter, in a way to be more effective and do more for the service and to accomplish the result sought in a better manner than it would have been had it been obeyed to the letter.

It is said that after the order of the 27th of August was received General Porter sent for his subordinate officers for the purpose of conferring with them as to what should be done in compliance with that order. The testimony shows that the officers were already there, and that the communication made by General Porter to them was that the order had been received and they must be ready to march at 1 o'clock in the morning.

General Porter was not the man to suggest any modification of the order. The subordinate officers, those who had been at the head of the forces marching through the heat and dust on that day; those who commanded privates that marched from fifteen to twenty miles that day and had just gone into camp, some of them not yet in camp; privates who had not yet received their rations, who had had but one meal that day and had not then had their suppers; the men who would require at least two hours to be properly fed and rested ready to resume the march—those officers said the order can be better obeyed by starting at 3 o'clock in the morning than by starting at 1 at night.

Further than that, gentlemen say there was a good road to travel over. What was the information brought that night by the messenger sent with that order from Pope? Let us see what General Butterfield says. Here is his version of it, and I want to read the whole of it:

He handed the order to General Morell or to General Sykes, who were present, and said there was a chance for a short nap, or something of that sort (I do not remember the exact words), indicating that there was but little time for preparation. General Sykes or General Morell, I do not remember which (one or both of them), spoke in regard to the fatigue our troops had endured, the darkness of the night, and the fact that in their judgment the troops would be of more service to start at a later hour than they would by starting at the hour named. In reply to these remarks General Porter spoke rather decidedly; that there was the order, it must be obeyed; that those who gave the order knew whether the necessities of the case would warrant the exertions that had to be made to comply with it.

Treason in Porter!

I do not state that as his exact words, but as the substance of what he said. Captain De Kay—

He was the man that brought the order—

Captain De Kay, who brought the order, was then present, and was asked some questions about the road. He stated that it was very dark, and that the road was full of teams. General Sykes, I think, suggested that it would be impossible for us to move at the hour named if the road was full of teams; that they could not find the way. General Porter called two aids, and sent them off to investigate the condition of the road, and to ask General Pope to have the road cleared so that we could come up. When we got outside the darkness was so apparent (to use such an expression) and it seemed to be such a matter of impossibility to move, that General Porter said: "In consideration of all the circumstances I will fix the hour at 3 o'clock instead of 1. You will be ready to move promptly."

There is General Porter's connection with that order of August 27 as detailed by an officer unimpeached and unimpeachable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to allude to the other order of August 29. I am not going to repeat the testimony that has been given here, but General Pope himself on the morning of the 30th of August declared that he had fought the combined forces of the enemy. What did the expression mean? What was it intended to be understood as meaning by Pope's superior officers to whom that report was made? Not merely that he fought Jackson's forces; not merely that he had a part of the rebel forces opposed to him, but that he had all combined. Yet when he went before the military court he testified that no considerable part of Longstreet's forces were there.

Now let us see how that report reads. It is the report made on the 30th of August, 1862:

NEAR GROVETON, VIRGINIA, 5 a. m.
Headquarters, Field of Battle.

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark, by which time the enemy was driven from the field, which we now occupy.

Does any man doubt that Pope was a man of truth? He was there upon the battlefield. He knew where the enemy had been. He was writing at 5 o'clock in the morning, and he wrote that he had fought—not a part of them, but he had them all against him—"the combined forces of the enemy." Yet in the face of that gentlemen who have argued this question on the other side still insist that Longstreet was not there. Pope said all the enemy's force was there. Where is the lawyer within the sound of my voice who ever hesitated to believe the statement a man had deliberately put upon paper before a controversy arose in connection with a transaction rather than believe him even on oath after a controversy had arisen and interests had become involved?

I want to read a little more of this, for it is interesting:

Our troops are too much exhausted yet to push matters, though I shall do so in the course of the morning, as soon as General Fitz-John Porter comes up from Manassas.

The traitor! the man who was to be tried for disobedience of an order at the critical juncture of a battle only the day before!

The enemy is still in our front but badly used up. We have lost not less than eight thousand men killed and wounded, but from appearances on the field the enemy lost not less than two to one. We stood strictly on the defensive, and every assault was made by ourselves.

[Laughter.]

If that is not as near what we denominate an Irish bull as ever appeared in the report of a battle, I do not know what would be one. But I think perhaps the next sentence explains why it occurred.

The battle was fought on the identical battlefield of Bull Run, which greatly increased the enthusiasm of the men.

Of course we are to expect an Irish bull in a report made under such circumstances; and I do not charge it as a fault to Pope that he did formulate a bull at that time and place.

The news just reaches me from the front that the enemy is retiring toward the mountain. I go forward at once to see. We have made great captures; but I am not able yet to form an idea of their extent. Our troops behaved splendidly.

Part of them? A division? Two divisions? No; all of them "behaved splendidly." Yet the most splendid corps of the Army, conceded by all to have been such, made such by its gallant leader, was only a short time after that to be charged, in the person of that leader, with not having been at the post of duty upon that day!

But I want to follow that a little further. It is said that General Porter's reports to General Burnside, made at the request of Burnside himself—because it seemed to be the only means of obtaining communication between the two divisions of the Army—in some instances commented on the conduct of the campaign. Let us see what Pope assumed to do in this identical report from which I have been reading:

I received a note this morning from General Franklin, written by order of General McClellan, saying that wagons and cars would be loaded and sent to Fairfax Station as soon as I could send a cavalry escort to Alexandria to bring them out.

Such a request when Alexandria is full of troops and we fighting the enemy needs no comment!

And that is the man always careful in all he did and said! He was the man who, say his champions on this floor, did not comment on the conduct of other officers!

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have agreed to give ten minutes of my time to another gentleman, and I must hasten on.

I wish to say here that so far as my action on this case is concerned I prefer to take the deliberate judgment of men like General Grant; of men who, after occupying a position where they could have done the service to Porter he now admits ought to have been done, that he now says would have been done had they given the matter that investigation which the importance of the case demanded—I say I prefer to take the judgment of General Grant when, upon investigation of the case, he not only says the former conviction against a gallant officer had been not only overcome, but when he is ready to come out and in a public letter declare his former prejudices have been wiped away by an investigation of the case: "I have reached the judgment which I now have, the conviction which I now have of your innocence, and your innocence from the beginning, in spite of my prejudice, in spite of the feeling I had against you, in spite of the convictions I had of your guilt, and now I am ready to bring my power, the power of my name, my military experience, all that has given me fame, all that has given me character, that has given me reputation before the American people, I am ready to lay it as a sacrifice, if need be, upon the altar of the vindication of a brave man, a gallant soldier worthy of vindication, which he asks at the hands of the present Congress." [Applause.]

And he stands not alone. The men who went into the reinvestigation are not simply men of military character and experience, but two of them at least entered upon the investigation of this case with all their prejudices against Fitz-John Porter. We had a gallant soldier of the war here this morning, and last night also, who had this prejudice, believing in Porter's guilt, until he, as an honorable man, having a duty to perform, entered on the investigation of this case, and that investigation led him just where, as I believe it will lead every honest, fair-minded man, to the conviction that Porter had been wronged, and it was the duty of the American Congress to right that wrong. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word more and I shall stop. It has been charged, and it has been charged solely for the purpose of accomplishing an object that I pray God may soon cease to be the desire of any American citizen of this Government, that Fitz-John Porter comes into this House to present his claim to a Congress composed in part of men who were once in rebellion against the laws and Government of the United States. Those men are here entitled to the same rights, the same privileges, the same immunities that every other citizen of the United States is entitled to; and when the time comes that I as an American, sitting in the American Congress, shall seek every opportunity I can find to slap in the face the men who are to-day as loyal and true as any man over whom the flag of the Government flies, I shall go out of it. [Applause.] I believe if this Government is to last, it can not last by perpetuating hatred between the sections. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. [Cries of "Order!"] I will not ask the question unless the gentleman gives me permission to interrupt him.

Mr. GIBSON. I submit when the gentleman is insubordinate he should be called to order.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will not ask the question unless I have the gentleman's permission.

Mr. FOLLETT. Then I wish to say further——

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FOLLETT. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, still further, that if there are any men upon the floor of this House who can pass impartially upon the merits of this controversy it is the men who have had their prejudices and their passions or their feelings aroused in no way whatever by the personal antagonism between two men each of whom occupied a conspicuous position in the Army of the United States.

Those passions and prejudices, existing, as claimed to-day upon this floor, between the graduates of West Point and the volunteer soldiers, they do not share, and in them they have no participation. Therefore, if there is anybody having at heart the interest of the American nation and the welfare of our American citizens, who can decide upon this question fairly and impartially, without bias, without passion, or without prejudice, it is the men against whom these bitter flings have been constantly made on this floor.

But, sir, I shall be sorry if the vote upon this proposition does not show that the people of the North have now got so far away from the prejudices and the passions which at the time the court-martial sat that tried General Porter prevailed, that they can not calmly and deliberately sit upon and decide a question of this character. I should be sorry to believe that any considerable number of our citizens or a majority of those sitting upon the floor of this Congress could fail to recognize the fact that an American general, an American citizen, an officer of credit to his Government, one who has written his name in characters of light by his deeds upon the escutcheon of his country, could not receive at their hands the vindication he deserves. [Applause.]

I believe five minutes of my time remain, which I yield to the gentleman from Colorada [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, and I have the courage of my convictions, and the boldness to do what is justice, without regard to the popular prejudices that may exist with reference to this matter.

During the course of the debate upon this bill, a few moments since, I took occasion to say that General Grant was, in my judgment, the greatest, the ablest soldier who had appeared since the time of Julius Cæsar. I said it advisedly. I now repeat the assertion—that, in my judgment, General Grant is not only the greatest of living soldiers, but the greatest who has appeared on the face of this earth since the time of Julius Cæsar. Pompey was conquered, Hannibal was conquered, Napoleon Bonaparte was conquered, but Grant never lost a battle in his magnificent career as a general of the armies of the United States. And General Grant, after a full and thorough examination of this case, says that injustice has been done to General Porter; and upon the judgment of this great and wonderful soldier I propose to predicate my vote and give my support to this bill. I believe in doing justice to all men. It is the sweetest attribute of humanity. It is the grandest attribute of Almighty God himself. I propose to bury the prejudices of the past, and I have entertained some of them myself, to do justice to a man whom the greatest general on the face of this earth says has been wronged and outraged. His judgment I will follow in support of this measure against all of the captains and colonels of the militia. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, from the beginning of this debate down to the present time we have been enlightened by generals, colonels, majors, captains, privates, military men all, who have given us their theories of this case from a purely military standpoint; and now for a few moments I desire the attention of the committee while I give you the theories and opinions of one who staid at home. [Laughter.] In doing this I have a right to demand your attention, because in this debate we men who did not enter the service have been assailed as being the authors of the trial of Fitz-John Porter and the cause of his final conviction and disgrace.

One gentleman went so far as to say that the first court-martial, or rather the only court-martial, convicted General Porter because of the clamor of the people. He said the people demanded a victim, and that in looking around for one in their frenzy they happened to fall upon Fitz-John Porter. Now, Mr. Chairman, being one of the people, having been among them during the entire contest, I want thus early to enter my protest against any such charge made against the loyal citizens of this country. No people in this world were ever more ready to give credit to any man who did anything or showed that he wanted to do anything to put down that rebellion than did the people of the North. They never clamored for any victims. True, Mr. Chairman, about the time of General Porter's trial there was some excitement in the North. There was some feeling among the people. Why? Because, as we all well know, at that time large numbers of women were walking our streets dressed in mourning; orphaned children were increasing in our midst; empty sleeves could be seen upon every corner; men on crutches were getting numerous; new-made graves filled by soldiers who had gone down to death at the front were to be seen in every graveyard of the North, and the question came to be asked, have we the right men leading our armies? Are the generals in command in earnest? Are they sufficiently indued with the importance of the great work on their hands, and are they ready to sacrifice everything to the doing of that work? The people did demand fair play, did demand that these generals should do their whole duty, but more than that they never asked. That much they had a right to require. At no time were any victims demanded. All the people ever claimed was that if any of these leaders were derelict in performing their sacred duty, were grumbling and dissatisfied because of their fancied wrongs; if any of them were determined to fight only when they could do it in their own way and under superiors of their own selection—if any such cases existed the people did demand that an example should be made, that there should be a weeding out of such officers, and that our armies should be led by generals who were fighting without any qualifications. Was this an unreasonable demand? No man can say that it was.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not discuss this case as a military man. In my argument I shall deploy no regiments, shall send out no skirmishers, attack no battlements, discourse upon no tactics, simply for the reason that I know nothing about such things, nor do I care anything about them so far as the justice and equity of this case is concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me, that I may ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly. And I wish to say if anybody else wants to ask me a question I hope he will do it. If any one desires even to inject a speech into this one of mine, if it is not too long and is a good one, I will let him do that also, since I have plenty of time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Does the gentleman know the difference between a brigade and a division?

Mr. HORR. I supposed I did. But since my friend from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] put the whole House so low down in military knowledge, and knowing as I do that I am way below the majority of you in that respect, it is fair to presume that I do not know the difference. [Laughter.] Let me again say that in discussing this question all I claim to know of military affairs is what I have learned from observation, what I have gathered from the reading of history, and the mere memory of events at the time when these transactions occurred. You must not forget that we were then in a peculiar situation. Our President was looking around in the dark, feeling to see if in any way he could find some one to lead our forces. It was a hunt after ability; a search for fitness; lantern in hand he was looking for a man. He may have made some mistakes. The task was not an easy one. He was compelled to try experiments. In doing this he fell upon General Pope to take command of the Army of Virginia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has told you that in choosing him he selected a man that had been three times brevetted for gallantry in the Mexican war; he selected a man who had done good service in the Army of Tennessee and had been promoted for that service; a man who had made a good record in the West, especially in Missouri; and let me say to you gentlemen, you men who feel so glorified at the very mention of McClellan's name—let me say to you that General Pope at the time he was selected to command the Army of Virginia had seen three times the service and won three times as many battles as McClellan had when he was placed at the head of the Army of the Potomac. Mr. Lincoln did the best he could; he selected this man because he had seen service, because he had been successful. Now, what was the duty of every officer under Pope?

Mr. PETTIBONE. To obey him.

Mr. HORR. Yes, to give attention to and obey his orders. There is not any doubt about it. Every man, whether he be soldier or civilian, knows that. But Pope was no sooner appointed than the trouble began. General Porter disliked Pope, felt himself to be the better officer, became dissatisfied, disgruntled, and finally neglected to give General Pope that hearty support which he ought to have given him, and which was due to General Pope simply because he had been legally placed in command.

We hear a great deal about treason and traitors, and there has been an effort made by several gentlemen on the other side to prove that before they could have convicted General Porter the court-martial should have found him guilty of treason, should have made out that he was as mean as Benedict Arnold. Why, sir, he was not tried for the same thing Arnold would have been tried for if we could have captured him. He was never accused of treason, never tried for that crime. He was tried for simply two things, disobedience of orders and bad conduct in the presence of the enemy.

To begin with, General Porter's letters and dispatches which he sent to Burnside and others show that he was in an improper state of mind towards the general in command. "In what way?" you may ask. First, that he despised General Pope; and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO]—I do not now see him in his seat—told us a week ago that Porter had a right to despise Pope. "Why," said he, "I despise Pope myself." You recollect his language. He then referred to that well-known dispatch of Pope's where he said his headquarters were in the saddle, and then exclaimed, "Where his brains were God only knows." [Laughter.] Now, I wish to say to my friend from New Jersey that while it may take Divine wisdom to find that out, ordinary human wisdom can tell him one thing, and that is where his brains were not. General Pope's brains were not two and a half miles in the rear of his army, sulking, disobeying orders, lolling in the shade, within the sound of the enemy's cannon, and devising no means of going to the aid of his comrades in arms. [Applause.]

Why talk to me about General Pope not being as good an officer as General Porter? That does not make any difference. His duty was to obey Pope, because he was his superior in command. The question of ability could not be raised. But gentlemen tell us that there was such a delay in making these charges. Do they forget that General Pope charged General Porter with not having done his duty in the first report made of the battle of the 29th and 30th? Is not that true? Now, it does not require any military skill to tell from the testimony whether when the order from Pope to Porter which reached Porter at 9.30 in the evening of the 27th, and commanded him to start at 1 o'clock the next morning, and to be at a certain place by daylight—I say it does not require any military skill to tell whether he obeyed that order or not. A jury of ordinary farmers or mechanics can answer that as well as anybody else. General Pope issued that order to him, and it reached him, as I have said, on the night of the 27th at 9.30, and directed him to leave with his command at 1 o'clock, but without fail to be at Bristoe Station at daylight the next morning. Now, whether he did it or not is a question that any man, though he may know as little of military affairs as General SLOCUM says we do, can find out conclusively from the testimony in this case.

Mr. PETTIBONE. It is a pure question of fact.

Mr. HORR. Certainly. But did he go? Now, I do not blame him for not being there the next morning at daylight. But did he try to go? Did he make the first move to start at 1 o'clock? Oh, do not talk to common people about there being some wagons in the road; about its being a dark night! Every reader of history knows that on the days previous to the battles of the world more than half the marches of each and every army have been made in the darkness of the night. The wagon trouble is still more nonsensical.

Stopped by a few wagons! Why, think of Napoleon at the battle of Jena! After he had got ready to form his lines, knowing or expecting that the fight would come on the next day, he went out alone and wandered in the darkness along the front of his troops. He heard something in the distance that he did not understand. He worked his way to it, and found that a hundred artillery wagons were wedged in between the rocks. They had in the darkness of the night mistaken a ravine for the road, and they could neither go backward nor forward. Did Napoleon go to bed because it was dark? Did the stalled wagons retard his operations? By no means. With a lantern in his own hands he hurried about, collected a force of men with picks and gads, mining tools, attacked those rocks, and about 3 o'clock in the morning moved his wagon-train out, got his artillery into position, and on the following day won the battle of Jena, and added one more victory to the long list that so terrified the crowned heads of Europe and astonished the world.

What did Porter do when this order reached him? He said, "Boys, here is something to sleep on;" and he immediately tumbled in and slept on it. [Laughter.] That is the simple truth. He did not even try to execute the order. His actions said plainer than words, "That is only an order from Pope. I know more than Pope; I will go when I get ready." But you gentlemen say that did not make any difference, because it was found out the next day that he was not needed there where he was ordered to go. Is there a man here who thinks that is a fair, decent answer to that question? When he turned in that night he did not know how it was going to turn out the next morning, did he? He did not know that the army in front would not need him early the next morning. Now, honestly, did he? How could he tell? His duty as a subordinate officer was simply to execute that order if it was in the power of human skill and exertion to execute it. He did not even attempt to execute it.

That is all I desire to say as to the order of the 27th. One word now about his lying quiet all day on the 29th. I do not care whether he had any orders or not. I say he acted in a manner unbecoming a soldier, knowing as he did that his comrades were in a hard fight and he within sound of the guns and all day long never attempting to go to their relief.

Now, it was not because he did not know how to get into a fight. He had been in a great many fights before that time. There had been no man in our Army up to that day who seemed able to get into one quicker than he could when he wanted to. He knew just the precise way to get into a fight. But never during that whole long day did he move to the front or attempt to get into that battle. Is there a man here who believes if McClellan had been in command that Porter would have acted in that way?

Now, right here will some of you military geniuses tell me what every order that Porter received during those three days clearly indicated? If they did not show anything else, if they were not clear on any other point, were they not certainly clear on this, that he (Porter), with his command, was to form a part of the attacking force? Is not that so? There was not a syllable in either of all those orders that indicated that he was to act as a reserve, that he was to remain in the rear. During those entire three days Porter never got a word to show that he was not expected to be at the front and to do his part of the work as a portion of the attacking line. Can any one deny this position?

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman point to a single order commanding General Porter to attack until the 4.30 order?

Mr. HORR. Now, that compels me to go into a long military discussion. [Laughter.] I remember, however, that McDowell swore that he told him, "Go in there," and he says that Porter's reply was: "If I go in there I will get into a fight."

Mr. BAYNE. But you were speaking of General Pope's orders.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was speaking of the orders of all his superiors. I was saying that only one interpretation could be placed upon all the orders he received taken as a whole. I do remember that General Pope sent him an order that, according to your own statement, reached him at 6.30 in the evening, directing him to attack the enemy. He sent one or two little brigades or pieces of brigades—I do not know what you call them; that is my trouble [laughter]—sent them a little way in, and then turned around and brought them back without firing a gun or getting anywhere near the enemy. And yet the rest of the army that day fought three long hours after Porter received that order, until the dead lay piled up on the field of battle, slaughtered by forces that should have been held in check by Porter's corps of veterans, and would have been had he done his duty that day.

You need not shake your heads, for I can tell you there were many men killed on that 29th day. Yes, there were.

There is a man here, on your own side, a confederate officer, who says that in attempting to cross that field after the battle he had to dismount from his horse and hitch him and go on foot that he might wind his way among the dead and not be compelled to clamber over the bodies that lay piled up on that bloody field. He knows about that. He saw these things with his own eyes. How can any one defend General Porter's conduct all through the 29th? What answer is made to all these charges? First we are told that Fitz-John Porter had no motive to do what we claim he did. Some one in this debate has said that he would not have blasted his former good reputation without some good reason, some motive. That seems plausible; but do you not know, gentlemen of the committee, that over three-fourths of all the disobedience of orders in military life that we read of in history has been brought about simply because somebody has been put in some place that somebody else wanted; because somebody has been put over somebody else, when he himself thought he ought to have been put over the other man? That is the history of military cases all over the world. Jealousy, envy, pride, all combine to make men see things strangely and do things that are inexplicable.

Why, sir, this exhibition of character is often seen, even in civil life. Take this House, and we will all admit that no higher type of civilization, no more exalted collection of humanity can be found on the face of the broad earth than we have right here in this Congress. [Laughter.] And yet, organize this House, let the Speaker arrange the committees, and put your men at the head of them, and in so doing let him skip some old member who has seen service, and grown gray in work for his party, and put some youngster in his place, some man whose political pin-feathers have hardly started, some man who has done little if any work for his party, and there will not be any kicking, eh!—no trouble? [Laughter.]

In a former Congress I served with one of the able men of this nation; and because he did not get the position which he thought he ought to have he did little work for that entire Congress.

There is now and then a man who rises above all such petty things; who says, "Put me where you will; I will try and do my duty." Such men are an honor to civil and military life both, but I am sorry to say there are too few of them.

Do you know that even Benedict Arnold, who afterward turned traitor to his country, was removed from his command before the battle of Saratoga because of the jealousy of General Gates? And yet, when the English guns began to resound in his ears, he left his tent, mounted his horse, rode into the fight on his own hook, and staid there until he was carried from the battlefield on a lfter. Yes, he did, and he did it because at that time he believed in his country and believed that it was his duty to fight the enemy wherever and whenever he could get a chance to do so.

Now, if General Porter when he found that General Pope was put in command over him thought Pope was not as good a general as himself, and if he had written to General Burnside and other generals that he distrusted Pope's ability and was fearful of the result, was afraid that he had not experience enough for the place, nobody would have blamed him if he had only added at the end, "No matter how that is, I am going to stand by my country and by my corps and fight to the end." Did he do that? No; he criticised and growled and complained, and showed that his heart was over at Alexandria with McClellan, and that he was determined that Pope should not succeed by anything he might do. He did what so many men have done before him—followed the promptings of his injured feelings and forgot the higher demands of duty.

The next answer they make us is, that Porter was a brave man. Certainly he had been as brave a man up to that time as we had perhaps in the Army. And so was Arnold brave before he betrayed his country. Why, do you know that he went into the Army or tried to get in at fifteen years of age? He was one of the first to go to the front after Lexington. He went to the capture of Ticonderoga the highest in command; but when he got among the "Green Mountain Boys" and found that their leader, Ethan Allen, had possession of the hearts of all of them, and when Allen said to him, "My men want to fight under me," "They want me for their leader," what did Arnold do? He surrendered his position as commander, and marched side by side with Ethan Allen as a private soldier, and helped to capture that fort. Afterwards he went to Quebec and on the heights of Abraham he fell wounded in making an assault. Afterwards he led our naval battle at Valcour Island in Lake Champlain, one of the bravest battles ever fought on land or sea; and when the boat upon which he was, the Congress, was disabled, and he found that it was necessary to sacrifice her to save his fleet, he fought her for hours against that entire British fleet, and then ran her ashore, sunk her, and with the few men left escaped to the wilderness, and found his way through the forests to our forces at the fort below. Afterward in Connecticut he led a battle in which he had his horse shot down under him, pierced with seven bullets. His career up to the surrender of Burgoyne was as brave as that of any man who ever lived. Yet in an unguarded moment he fell. And he fell forever. No man ever questioned his bravery, but bravery alone will not save men from acts of insubordination.

Now, I do not use this illustration for the purpose of comparing General Porter with Benedict Arnold; I would not do that. I simply use it for the purpose of showing that a man can be as brave as any man on the face of the earth and yet not do his duty. Fitz-John Porter was not tried for cowardice; he was tried for disobedience of orders and for bad behavior as a commanding officer in the face of the enemy.

They tell us next as an answer that the court-martial that tried Porter was not an impartial tribunal. I wish to say to the members of this House that if that was not a fair court, you could not by any possible means have selected one from the whole Army of the United States. Six of those men had graduated at West Point—the same school that graduated General Porter. All of them had seen honorable service; not a man on the list who did not possess an excellent reputation; all men of ability and integrity. Each member of that court was liable to be tried by just such a tribunal. Each one of them was sensitive as to the honor of his fellow-officers, and the reputation of the Army was sacred in the eyes of each of those men. They tried the case when the facts were new and fresh in the minds of the witnesses. They gave forty-five days of severe labor to the examination of it, and then unanimously found this man guilty as charged. If their decision is not entitled to respect, then let us never in the future attempt to hold another court-martial. Let the system be abandoned now and forever.

But I must hurry on. I wish now to call attention to another fact. This second court, the board of inquiry, was convened simply for the purpose of getting up a plea on which General Porter could be pardoned. The remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] clearly show that. I wonder how many governors of States there are in this body. If there are any I would like to ask them one question: Did you ever receive a petition for the pardon of a criminal when the papers filed with it did not show conclusively, if you believed their statements, that it was the jury that ought to have been sent to the penitentiary instead of the criminal? [Laughter.] It is the history of pardons all over the country that the ex parte case made for the purpose of securing the pardon invariably shows that the prisoner ought never to have been convicted. More than one governor has assured me that such is the case.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly, if you will be brief.

Mr. BELFORD. Does not General Grant say, in the letter which he has written on this case, that occasions arise when a corps commander should disobey the order of the general of the army? Does not General Grant say so?

Mr. HORR. I wish my friend would not anticipate me; that is the very next topic on my notes. [Laughter.] The next reason we are told why General Porter should be reinstated and put back into the Army is because General Grant has written a letter saying so. I wish my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] was over here [pointing to the Democratic side], because I want to talk a minute or two about General Grant to the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House [laughter], and I would like to have the gentleman from Colorado receive any benefit that may arise therefrom. I have believed in General Grant a good many years. It has been my pleasure to come as near worshiping him as I have any man that this country has lately produced. For twenty years I have heard you gentlemen slander him, vilify him, call him hard names. [Mr. ROSECRANS shook his head.] I will acquit my friend from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] of this charge; for I do not know that I have ever heard of his intimating a syllable of the kind; but it was because he was not up to the tactics of his party and did not sympathize with their methods. That must have been the reason he did not agree with his brethren. Still I repeat what every one of you knows to be true, that if you could think of any vile name to apply to a man, some of you have applied it to General Grant. Yes, you have. [Laughter.] You have belittled his intellect; you have abused his private character; you have assailed him as a soldier; you have called him a "butcher;" you have heaped upon him such coarse and abusive epithets as would not be polite to repeat here in the presence of the ladies in the gallery. For that reason I will not attempt to tell all the things you have said about him. [Laughter.]

Now, you are the men who come in and say to me, "What are you going to do with General Grant's letter? How are you going to get over that?" Well, I would like to know why that should so much concern you gentlemen? [Laughter.] How many hours is it since his opinions became so sacred in the eyes of the entire Democratic party? [Laughter.] Still, if it will please you I will tell you what I am going to do about him and his letter. I am going to say that that grand old man has in my opinion made a mistake in this one case; and as long as it is almost the only mistake of his life I am going to differ with him on this case, and still stand by him longer, stick to him closer, and believe in him more implicitly in the future than any man of you dare promise to do. [Laughter.] Is that full and satisfactory? [Laughter.] You understand me. Here and now I will agree to take his advice and respect his memory longer than any one of you will. Ah, for these long years you have agreed with him only in this one case where he happens to agree with you. [Applause.]

Now, then, I wish to say to my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]—where is he? I do not see him in his seat. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. He is over here.

Mr. HORR. Ah, yes; he is right here, is he? I wish to say to my friend from Colorado just this: I beg of you, do not allow these men to mislead you. [Laughter and applause.] They know and I know you are loyal to Grant, and they, having tackled you on every corner and having failed to reach you, all of a sudden it occurred to them as a final resort that you were tender on the Grant question and then they put Grant at you. [Laughter.] Do you not see it is all a trick on their part? They are not the men to quote Grant to you and me. They are not for Grant. They were always against him. They only happen to be for Grant in this one case because Grant happens to be with them. [Laughter and applause.] To carry their point you would think, to hear them talk, that General Grant is a political saint; not only a great military chieftain but a statesman. You and I found that out years ago, but it is new with these gentlemen. It never struck them until since we opened this case. [Applause.] So much for General Grant.

But I must hurry on. The next thing they tell us as a reason why this man should be cleared is that General Garfield once moved for a court of inquiry about this when he was in Congress. And my gallant friend from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] mistook that and called him the author of this bill. Now, my acquaintance with General Garfield has been of thirty years' standing. We were boys in almost adjoining counties. I say to you, and I do not stand alone in my knowledge of these facts when I tell you, that when we expected in one of the last Congresses that this bill was to be up for debate General Garfield prepared to make an argument against it.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is so.

Mr. HORR. There are more than myself who know he said he felt more keenly the assaults made in the report of the West Point board upon the findings of the court-martial than anything that had occurred to him in his long public life.

Mr. BELFORD. Allow me to ask you whether General ROSECRANS and General SLOCUM, both in favor of this bill, were not loyal soldiers? Are not those loyal soldiers to the Union, Generals Grant, ROSECRANS, and SLOCUM, in favor of this bill? [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. Yes, they were all good, loyal soldiers.

Mr. BELFORD. Is there any doubt about that fact? [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. None in the least, and to offset them there are three thousand other officers just as good, just as loyal, who are against it. [Applause.] The trouble is, these military men do not agree; they differ as to what is proven, what is the law, and what ought to have been done, both on the field and in the court-martial.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Generals Schofield, Getty, and Terry, after careful examination, are also in favor of it, and the whole Fifth Corps have petitioned for its passage. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Republicans, every one of them.

Mr. SLOCUM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HORR. Certainly, general, I would like to please you.

Mr. SLOCUM. For the first time in my life I have interrupted a gentleman while he was speaking on this floor. I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan I have in my possession the original letters of General Garfield saying he was in favor of this commission.

Mr. HORR. Of what?

Mr. SLOCUM. Of this commission—the Schofield board.

Mr. HORR. There is not any doubt about it. This far, that he was in favor of a commission. He moved for one:

Mr. SLOCUM. I have those letters. They will be produced before this House by a gentleman on your own side and one whom you have confidence in.

Mr. HORR. I said he had——

Mr. SLOCUM. Well, one word more. If General Garfield did not propose to abide by the decision of his board why did he order it?

Mr. HORR. I will tell you why. That is a fair question. Because your men were claiming all over the country that he had been unjust, partial.

Mr. PETTIBONE. As a judge.

Mr. HORR. Yes, as a judge. He said select any good men and give them all the facts and they will decide just as we did, and he had the courage to ask it to be done. When this other board came in and filed what to me is a mere pettifogging plea, he stood back and washed his hands of it, and declared that he considered it an outrage on the facts in the case and unjust to himself and the other members of the court-martial and to all the men engaged in that trial.

Mr. SLOCUM. Oh, that will not do, my friend.

Mr. HORR. That will do. [Laughter.] I know because I heard him say it himself. Can the gentleman imagine for one moment that because General Garfield was in favor of this board that he thereby agreed to indorse its findings?

Mr. SLOCUM. One word. In pursuance of General Garfield's recommendation a board of the most distinguished officers of the Army was appointed and every one of them was a Republican.

Mr. HORR. Republican?

Mr. SLOCUM. Yes, every one of them was a Republican. They all belonged to your side of the House. And they came in here with a unanimous report, and I was never so astonished in all my life as I was to hear the men of their own party opposing the confirmation of that report.

Mr. HORR. I did not know before that politics——

Mr. BELFORD. Just let me say——

Mr. HORR. Oh, keep still. [Laughter].

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HORR. Not now. Now I did not know the politics of that board before. I did not even know that politics entered into their work. I had supposed that this was a question of military discipline, and should be tried without any reference to the politics of the board or of any of the witnesses. The court-martial that tried this case in the outset was not a political body. That court-martial was a judicial body, made up of military men, and was composed of nine able men, each man the peer of any of the three men whom the gentleman has mentioned. So you have nine against three. That is all there is of it. They heard the testimony when the facts were fresh in the minds of the witnesses. They heard it when all of the facts bearing on the case could be verified They heard it before death had sealed the lips of a portion of the witnesses, before they had ceased to be able to tell their story. They could see each witness face to face and judge of his character and veracity.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. To be sure.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to ask if the West Point board did not have all the testimony of the court-martial before it; and was not every witness examined before the West Point board that was examined before the original court-martial, except two or three who were dead, and General Pope, who refused to respond to the subpœna?

Mr. HORR. Now there my friend launches right into the mazes of all that proof again. [Laughter.] He may be correct about that. I do not care whether he is or not. The first court-martial had all of the evidence that could be produced. They tried the case fairly, and they found the man guilty. What the confederate generals may now testify matters little to me. General Pope gave his orders on what appeared to be the condition of affairs. Porter had nothing to act upon but conjecture. His duty was to obey the orders given by his superior, based on all he could then find out. The fact that he would have been defeated is no excuse for not making an effort. After their decision, what next. Their finding was reviewed first by the Judge-Advocate-General and approved by him, and then it went into the hands of the President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. He, as the proof shows, gave it careful attention, examined it cautiously. I have read enough of the case to find out that much. President Lincoln, I say, examined the case as a lawyer or a judge would have done. We all know how his great heart always went out with tenderness and mercy toward every one in trouble. It is said he never found any one guilty if he could help it while he was President of the United States. He never signed a single judgment of a court-martial which consigned a man to death.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Never.

Mr. HORR. But after examining this matter in the light of all the evidence, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and with a full knowledge of all the facts, he approved the sentence of that court-martial. Now, I say to you that that approval was a final decision of the case, and you have no more right by legislative enactment to revoke and nullify it than you have to revoke or nullify any other decree of a court of final resort in this country.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Do you believe that Governor Newell, of New Jersey, would swear to what is false?

Mr. HORR. I do not know Governor Newell, of New Jersey, and have no reason to discredit him——

Mr. BAYNE. Did not he swear that President Lincoln said to him that he signed the record upon the report of the Judge-Advocate-General, and that he had not himself examined the evidence?

Mr. HORR. I know of no such evidence, but since the gentleman is asking questions, let me ask him one.

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. Did not this last board call Robert Lincoln before it as a witness?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HORR. Did they not try to prove by him what Mr. Lincoln said with reference to the signing of the decree of the court-martial upon the report simply of the Attorney-General?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HORR. Did not he simply deny it, and say that his father told him after the court-martial, and after his examination of the case, that the facts in the case would have justified, in his opinion, a sentence of death? My memory is that Robert Lincoln testified to exactly that. [Applause.] You can make me believe that President Lincoln signed that approval hesitatingly, with tears in his eyes, if you please, but that he did it unadvisedly, without examination, never.

Mr. BAYNE. But let me say—

Mr. HORR. But, Mr. Chairman, there is no use in undertaking to change the existence of facts. President Lincoln was not in the habit of signing such documents at random. He signed this verdict of this court-martial because the evidence compelled him to do it. No man need tell me that Mr. Lincoln signed the finding of this, the most important court-martial of the war, without examination. Such a statement belies every act of his life. He could have been driven to sign such a document only by a sense of his sacred duty to the people of this country over whom he was presiding. No man was ever more careful and painstaking than he.

Mr. BELFORD. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. HORR. Yes, go on.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, is it not a fact that in nine cases out of ten the President of the United States has not the time to give his personal attention to the examination of these matters? He must examine the general results. But here we have the fact that General Grant, as a private citizen, having ample time to examine the whole question, has certified to the country that the judgment in that case was unjust. Is not that a fact?

Mr. HORR. Why, Mr. Chairman, I thought I had General Grant on the brain pretty badly, but I surrender to my friend from Colorado. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. Grant never surrendered. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HORR. Right, my friend, because General Grant had subordinates who always obeyed his orders. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is it.

Mr. HORR. And Grant was successful from the beginning to the end of his military career because his subordinates understood that if they did not obey it meant business. He had a sort of business way about him anyway during that war, as my friend knows, and he was in the habit of managing things himself. His under officers knew when he gave an order it called for quick, prompt action. One of the generals of our Army told me less than two years ago, and I am sorry that he is now dead and in his grave, that in one of the battles of our late war he got an order from General Grant, sent to him on the field of battle, telling him to lead his brigade into a certain place. He immediately put his line in order, and just then he saw, a few hundred yards from him, General Grant and his staff riding through the fields inspecting the lines. He said, I was so well satisfied that to obey that order would sacrifice my entire brigade that while they were forming I rode across to General Grant. I said to him: "General, I have received your order. To do what you tell me will cost the lives of my entire brigade." What did General Grant do? Said he: "Young man, I am glad you understand your order," and rode off to issue others. That officer did go in; and he told me that two-thirds of his brigade were left on that field. But it may be that thereby he saved the army from defeat and thousands of other lives that would have been sacrificed if he had acted as Porter did on the 29th. [Applause.]

But I must hurry on. Now, I want to address myself quietly——

Mr. SLOCUM. Will the gentleman give the name of that brigade commander? I have a good deal of curiosity to know who he was.

Mr. HORR. I will do it cheerfully if the gentleman will come to me privately. I do not want to publish it here.

Mr. SLOCUM. And the battle?

A MEMBER. It was General Hurlbut.

Mr. HORR. Many here have heard him tell it, and some one has named him. I will say, then, it was General Hurlbut, of Illinois. Perhaps he too was one of those men who did not believe in Porter. Of course if he did not believe in Porter, then you gentlemen will give him no credit. Then there is nothing too bad to say about him as a soldier. If he did believe in Porter, then of course he was a great general. [Laughter.]

I want now to come to a little talk quietly with you gentlemen who were fighting on the other side. In doing this I do not intend to stir up any feelings of animosity. I do not want to arouse any antagonisms. I simply want to talk to you as sensible men.

Now, when this Porter trial occurred we were in a good deal of trouble in this country, were we not? and you, too, were in trouble, were you not? Yes, there was a great deal of trouble all over the United States at that time. We can all agree as to that. We of the North were managing one side of the contest, and you of the South were managing the other side. We were doing the best we could, and you were doing the best you could. My propositions are clear, are they not? Now we were sometimes at a great loss to know just what to do. Sometimes we probably made mistakes. Sometimes we probably did things that if we had known better we would not have done; things that injured our cause. When we did that you received the benefit of our mistakes, did you not? And you rejoiced at the time because we had made them, though you may not now. Am I not right? What I ask is, now that the trouble is all over, now that you are back here representing this great nation in Congress, whether it is fair that you should come in and rip up our old settlements and vote on the question as to whether we decided our difficult problems correctly or not?

Mr. SLOCUM. One word. Does the gentleman know on which side General ROSECRANS, General ROGERS, General GREENLEAF fought?

Mr. ROSECRANS rose.

The CHAIRMAN rapped to order.

Mr. HORR (addressing Mr. ROSECRANS). Certainly I know, and I was not talking to my friend from California.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Yes, sir; you pointed over this way.

Mr. HORR. No, sir; I was addressing the men who fought on the other side. Why, good God, general, you were on our side then! [Laughter.] I am simply asking whether it is a matter of good taste for these gentlemen who fought against us to come in now and reverse the decisions that were made at that time. I am not speaking to you men who believed in the Union cause.

Right here let me give a little history by way of illustration. You all recollect that during the war—General ROSECRANS recollects it as well as anybody on this floor—we in Ohio got into difficulty through a man by the name of Vallandigham. I lived in Ohio then. You all remember after a while President Lincoln sent him over the border. You recollect when he did it. Most of you men over there—not you, general—but most of you men now on that side of the House said it was an act of tyranny, an act of usurpation. You said Lincoln was a tyrant. Yes, you did; the most of you did.

Now, suppose there was a resolution brought in here declaring that in that transaction Abraham Lincoln did act the part of a tyrant, was a usurper, and that Vallandigham acted the part of a patriot. How would you gentlemen of the confederate army vote on such a resolution? How would you vote on it, if you should vote as you believe? You gentlemen remember when he was sent through the lines; you fêted him, honored him, gave him triumphal marches from one end of the South to the other. Now, the point I make is: suppose such a resolution was offered here, would it be fair for you gentlemen who were on the other side to come in here and vote upon it at all? I say that good taste, fair treatment would compel you to stand aloof, not to meddle in those matters.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I will ask five minutes through the courtesy of the gentleman from Michigan to answer his interrogatory.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. HORR. Certainly I yield. I shall be pleased to know how my position strikes one who fought against us.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for the opportunity here and now to place myself on record in regard to this controversy. And I speak for myself, myself alone, not as a confederate general or one skilled in the science of war, but as a boy who at 17 years of age loved the confederate cause, saw no taint upon its banner, followed it, shed his blood for it, and thought he was right. I speak to-day, so help me God, without one thought of treason, and loving that flag that is over your head as dearly as did Daniel Webster when he apostrophized it, as you all remember. [Applause.]

I speak, however, as one who, as he has heard this debate, has felt that his mind wandered off from it despite himself and was back with the graves of the confederate dead. I recognize, sir, the propriety of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan. I appeal to the confederate soldiers here to know whether, as this discussion has progressed, instead of following the triumphs of Grant and the troubles of Porter, their minds and thoughts have not been back with the graves of their brethren and friends, and whether they do not realize that this is the most anomalous spectacle ever witnessed in the history of any land where the vanquished are called upon to cast the votes which shall decide the balance in the contested glories of their victors? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, for myself I accept the issue as presented. I turn from this scene with irrepressible sadness as one in which I properly have no participation. I see the panorama of the past once more come before me. I feel once more as if we were back in the bloody angle of the wilderness or gasping in the smoke and sulphurous vapor of the crater. The blood of Gettysburg is red once more. The tears of Appomattox flow again. The specter forms of the lost cause beckon me away from this controversy as one in which I have no part.

And so, my brethren of the North, ay, brethren now without one tinge of bitterness, while you are deciding who was the Achilles, who the Diomedes, who the Ajax Telamon of your triumphant arms, I stand aside. It is no controversy of mine. My thoughts shall stray back meanwhile to the camp of the conquered, where the silent sentries keep their watch across the river, and the confederate dead are sleeping beneath the shadows of the trees. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. I thank the gentleman for his frankness. I am glad that he sees the correctness of my position and has the courage to announce his opinion.

I know that whatever these other gentlemen may do they can not help feeling the impropriety of being asked to come in here and settle these questions between us men of the North. I was saying that we had trials and troubles, that we made mistakes, but we settled these matters as best we could; and now if you will give me your attention a moment I will say that it is time we stopped raking up these old matters. "Let the dead past bury its dead." We on this side of the House did not bring in this bill. I say it is time that you gentlemen gave the people of this country to understand that you are ready to drop those old controversies, that you are ready to start anew, and for the future to work for the good of the country, untrammeled by the scenes of the war.

But you can not do that by taking every opportunity you can find to reverse the decisions of our courts-martial, to reverse the decisions of our officers in high command and of high rank in civil and military life, and by opening up again the many questions which have been fairly and honestly closed for twenty years.

I want to say one word to my distinguished friend from New York who has charge of this bill [Mr. SLOCUM]. At the close of his remarks, with that eloquence for which he is noted and characterized, he begged of us on this side of the House to throw away partisan feeling. He said, "Don't, I beg of you, don't let us have any partisanship in this matter." Well, let me say to gentlemen here that we are somewhat divided over on this side of the House; there is no partisanship over here. How is it, general, over there with you? How many Democrats are going to vote against this bill? Are there fifty of you; are there twenty of you; are there ten of you; are there five of you? Is there one who is going to vote against this bill? Come, do not all speak at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. There ought not to be one.

Mr. HORR. There is not one, then?

Mr. SLOCUM. If you let this thing rest one year longer, with such accessions as General Porter has had from your own party, I would leave it to yourselves to decide.

Mr. REED. We will agree to that.

Mr. HORR. Yes, indeed; we agree to that.

Mr. SLOCUM. Day after day and week after week there will be converts on your side.

Mr. HORR. I am glad my aged friend is already "under conviction." He must know that it is the proper thing to do, to leave it to the men of the North who first had to decide the matter, the Union men I mean. When those men decide to put General Porter back into the Army I shall be content; and I do not say this with any feeling of harshness or disrespect to those gentlemen who fought against us, and they know it, but I do claim that their situation should preclude them from taking any part in this decision now.

But I was talking about my friend's idea of partisanship, and it is not fair for him to break in upon a man in this way just as he is reaching his climax. [Great laughter.] I was asking you if there was one man on the other side of the House who is going to vote against this bill? What do you mean, general, by partisanship? Is it where the Democrats vote all one way, and the Republicans vote as they believe, some one way and some the other, as we do on this bill. [Laughter.]

I remember that in my State there was an old man, the father of a large family. The family had grown up, and one day they got into a very hot religious discussion. The old gentleman was a zealous Methodist, but his children, girls and boys, had varied theological notions. The discussion grew hot, as such discussions sometimes do. Finally the old gentleman broke in upon them and said, "Tut! tut! children; stop, let us have no sectarianism in this family; let us all be Methodists." [Great laughter.]

Now, that is what my friend from New York means by non-partisanship; that we on this side shall vote one way or the other, as we think right, and that the Democrats shall vote solid, all one way. It is only Republicans who become partisan by voting solidly together.

Oh! I have heard too much of this partisan talk within the last few years; I am tired of it. If you men desire to rise above party now is your opportunity. We have done it on this side the House. Come, then, let me join my military friend from New York, and beg of you to take his advice. Do not all hang together. Examine this case as we have done, and vote from your convictions just this once. [Applause.]

Do you know that if this had been the case of a confederate soldier whom your generals had tried and convicted and we were now attempting to do what you are trying to do, to reverse your decision, the old confederate cry would come up here until we would be driven from this Chamber because of the injustice of men on our side of the House going over and trying to settle your old difficulty? That would be none of our business, you would say, and you would be right. Like us, you probably made mistakes; you probably convicted men you ought not to have convicted. We may have done the same thing. Be that as it may, it is no more than fair that we should let your decisions of your own matters, made in your own way, rest where you left them. It is equally fair that you should refuse to step in and decide matters tried and settled among ourselves twenty years ago.

After some further interruption,

Mr. HORR said: In conclusion let me repeat, it is time that people stopped raking up these old matters, stopped trying to reverse the decisions of the war. But you say, "We want to vindicate Fitz-John Porter." Why, gentlemen, the time has gone by when that can be done. This jury that is trying him to-day can not do it. Do you know, as the friends of Porter, that among the Union people of the North to acquit him by your votes—I mean by the solid votes of the men who at that time were on the other side—would be the most cruel thing that you can do to his memory?

Mr. SLOCUM. Whose votes?

Mr. HORR. The votes of the men who fought on the other side and received the benefits of his tardiness and failure to obey his superiors, if there were any to receive. The men who fought against us then are here now and have the legal right to vote on this question. I do not deny the legal right. But I do say that as a matter of good taste and fair dealing they ought to let this thing alone; they ought to stand aloof from it. They had no part in it then; they should refuse to meddle with it now. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Do you mean to say that, being here as American Representatives and the question is presented to us, it does not become our duty to act in accordance with our conscientious convictions?

Mr. HORR. That is a fair question. I say to the gentleman that the rules of this House permit a member here, if any bill is brought before it, and he has so much interest in it as amounts to 5 cents, the rules permit him to get up here and say to the House, "My relation to this bill is such that I ask to be excused from voting on it." And for the paltry sum of 5 cents you would be allowed to walk off and not vote.

Now, do you think you would not also be excused from voting if you should rise here in your place and say, "Gentlemen, when these scenes were transacted my position was this: I was trying to destroy this Government because I thought it ought to be destroyed. I and others were fighting for what we believed to be right; my whole interest was against the boys who were fighting with Porter, and if he did not do his duty I got the benefit of it. This general was one of yours, not mine, and now I prefer to take no part in this fight." Would any one ask you to vote after that statement? The stake is more than 5 cents; it is the lives of a good many men who went down to death on the 29th of August. It is the reputation of many Union generals who acted on that court-martial; it is the character of Abraham Lincoln and his associates in power; it is the good name of General Garfield. All these are involved in this case. You were interested in it. I think your position then estops you now from standing up before the American people and deciding as to the propriety of what we men whom you were fighting did.

Mr. GIBSON. You have not answered my question.

Mr. HORR. I think that is an answer. Ask it again.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the simple question whether you mean to say that, as American Representatives, we ought not to discharge our duty by acting in accordance with our conscientious convictions?

Mr. HORR. My dear sir, that is exactly what I did answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended.

Mr. SLOCUM. I have no objection.

Mr. HORR. I am very much obliged. I did not intend to occupy one moment beyond my hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Michigan? [Cries of "Go on!"] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] talks about his "conscientious convictions." He means this, as I understand him, that if he has a clear idea about the way this ought to be decided, ought he not to vote that way? Let me tell you what is the trouble, my friend. The state of mind in which you approach this examination necessarily precludes you from giving a fair decision. You start in with all your convictions formed. I know you do not think so; but it is utterly impossible for you to judge this case impartially. Suppose to-morrow the question was brought in here whether Jefferson Davis was a traitor and ought to have been hanged; do you think I would be a fair juryman on that question?

Mr. GIBSON. I doubt it.

Mr. HORR. Yes, you doubt it, and so do I. [Laughter.] But I would be just as fair a juror in that case as you gentlemen are in this. [Applause.] I would not sit on such a case. Why? Because my mind was long since made up. I have even on several occasions expressed an opinion. I may have prejudices on that question; I have "conscientious convictions" upon it I know, and yet you would all say that my decision in such a case would not be fair to you gentlemen who believed in Mr. Davis. Now I say that your position—I am not finding fault with you; you understand me?

Mr. GIBSON. Oh, I understand you.

Mr. HORR. I say the state of mind you are in necessarily precludes you from being a proper juror. You would not be permitted to sit—none of you—on any jury upon a case involving $20 if you had been as much interested beforehand in such a case as you were in this case. [Laughter.] Yet you gentlemen come and propose to do—what? "Vindicate" Fitz-John Porter! I was just saying that such a "vindication" is impossible. When he disobeyed the order of his superior, when he refused under the sound of the enemy's guns to go into battle to save his country, when the court-martial convened and tried him patiently and fairly, and President Lincoln approved their finding, Fitz-John Porter's record was made. The curtain then dropped. The bed he had made himself he must now sleep in. You have not the power to raise that curtain, simply because you have not the power to carry conviction to the mind of the civilized world that you are disinterested jurors, for you are not; you can not be; and General Porter must go into history with the record he himself made. His evident determination that he would in no way aid General Pope to win any victory; his tardy, sulking, insubordinate actions at the second battle of Bull Run are the written history of the past, and no vote of this or any other Congress can wipe out the stain he then and there cast upon his own name as a military man.

Now, I want to say just one word in conclusion. I am well aware that you intend to pass this bill; I am well aware that you have the power to do it; but with my convictions I can not permit it to pass without entering my solemn protest. In the name of good discipline for the future in the American Army I do protest; in the name of the loyal men of the North who sustained our armies, who stood by this Government and settled these questions once and supposed they had settled them forever, I protest; in the name of the one-armed, one-legged, maimed, wounded soldiers scattered all over the United States, I protest. If our Army suffers for efficiency on account of the numbers on the retired-list, let me suggest that scattered all over this land are brave men who lost limbs, lost health, lost everything but their honor, whose names could be substituted with propriety for that of this man, who was convicted by as fair a court as ever convened of not doing his duty. In the name of those soldiers I here and now protest. Ay, in the name of the thousands of "boys" who died on that 29th of August, when this man was lying in the shade, and whose spirits are now crying to us from the ground to do justice to them and their memory, I protest against the passage of this bill. And, gentlemen of the committee, before you vote this measure through stop and think. You are constantly telling us you want these questions dropped out of sight, that you want to have the country go on in its work of peace in building up the great commercial interests of the country. So do we; and if you will stop going back and trying to undo the things which we honestly—maybe mistakenly—but honestly decided, we will stop talking to you about your past record. Until then you must expect us people of the North to be jealous about the conduct of the war and the decisions then made. They cost us blood, they cost us treasure. We believe, as a whole, we were governed at that time by men who had patriotic hearts and great brains, and we are satisfied with their decisions; and whether you are satisfied or not, we insist that good taste, good faith, and good feeling all demand that a large number of you should at least remain silent on this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SLOCUM took the floor, and yielded for five minutes to Mr. BRECKINRIDGE.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] who has just spoken to what I believe to be the mistake he makes in stating the position of the confederate element on this floor. We are not called upon to vindicate Fitz-John Porter. He was vindicated at West Point, and we are only called upon to give effect to that vindication. The question is, shall we stand back and not vote the legitimate consequences of his vindication by a Union board, a unanimous Union board, a military board, a Republican board, or shall we say that that man who fought against us shall not receive the legitimate consequences of the vindication which has been awarded him unanimously by his peers?

Mr. HORR. In reply to my friend from Arkansas I wish to say that I made no mistake. To start with I deny that board did vindicate Fitz-John Porter. I deny they had the power to do it or the right to do it. If they did vindicate him, why do you not let him alone? Why are you trying to add something more to it?

Why, my friend from Arkansas forgets that the question whether they did vindicate him or not is one of the questions in this dispute. We do not think they did. Now, is it fair for you, I do not know whether you fought on the other side or not——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I did.

Mr. HORR. I did not know but you were one like myself who staid at home. Now, do you think it would be fair for us to try a case whether you had treated some one not exactly right during the war?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The case is not analogous. This is not a question as to whether we shall be upon the board of review. The board of review vindicated. It was wholly Republican, thoroughly military. Very eminent, emphatic and unanimous in its finding. recommending far more than is now proposed. No confederate helped to bring this about. But since it is brought about, no confederate can fail to vote in favor of the consequences of the finding without placing himself in the attitude of an obstinate, vindictive, and unrelenting foe.

Mr. HORR. There is never anything analogous on that side. [Laughter.] Analogous is all on the other side. That is the trouble about it. [Laughter.] There is nothing analogous. [Cries of "Order!"] It goes to the mental condition. [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SLOCUM. Mr. Chairman, it was understood there was to be one speech more before the adjournment this evening, but it is so late now, and I think most of the members are so tired, I believe I will now submit the motion the committee rise. I have got so utterly confounded hearing the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] saying "we" and "you fellows," "we did this" and "we did that," that I do not know whether Grant fought on the Union side or whether I did myself. If the gentleman from Michigan is right he was on one side and I was on the other. That is the position it has assumed.

Mr. HORR. Do I understand——

Mr. SLOCUM. I understand what you have been saying all day. It has been "we" and "we" on your side of the House, and you recognized everybody else as enemies of the Union. [Applause.] I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that one hour longer this afternoon can well be devoted to this debate.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly. The House is full, the galleries are full, and we may just as well go on.

Mr. SLOCUM. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, it is within twenty minutes of 5 o'clock. I think the committee ought to rise.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that if gentlemen are anxious to have a vote upon this bill the debate had better be continued for a while longer. There are several members who want to speak, and there are also a number of gentlemen who want to be heard in brief speeches of ten minutes, expressing the motives which will induce them to vote for or against the bill, and if debate is to be cut off at an early hour you will find that you will not get a vote for many days upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise has been withdrawn.

The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, from a very full, a very thorough and careful, examination of all the testimony, and with all of the light that I could receive outside of the testimony—for I believe that we have a right as members of Congress to possess ourselves of all of the light that can be given upon such a subject—I say from such an investigation I have come to the deliberate conclusion that Fitz-John Porter was a noble, a gallant, and a brave soldier of the Union, a man who loved the Union, and who fought for it, and who never at any time previous to September, 1862, violated his trust. Having deliberately come to the conclusion that he was, as was eloquently expressed by my friend from Michigan, a man without a stain or a blemish upon a pure, noble, and gallant character; that he had maintained himself up to that time with all the bearing and dignity of a soldier; and going further than my friend from Michigan goes, that at that time, the very time that these charges were brought against him, he showed the proudest record of his proud life—as proud as that of any Union or confederate soldier ever showed upon this earth—I propose without any passion, without any prejudices, or any discrimination between the men who fought upon the Union side and those who so gallantly fought us upon the other side, to examine this case from such a standpoint as I think is right and proper in the premises.

I have said I believed that Fitz-John Porter was a hero. I go further, and say that by the judgment of that court-martial he became a martyr, and has been a martyr ever since. And I want to call the attention of this committee to a few facts in relation to the matter. But before I commence this investigation I will say that the arguments coming from the gentlemen who are opposed to this bill have struck me with a great deal of astonishment. There is an effort made here, and a persistent effort, to blacken the character of a man already, as they say, under sentence of conviction; and I want to call your attention before I have commenced with the investigation of the charges against him, and I propose to show conclusively by facts, that upon the very occasion you condemn him for he showed such wisdom, so much skill, so much bravery, so much honesty and purity of character as entitle him to be placed side by side with the most gallant and chivalrous of American soldiers. I propose to establish the fact that he showed as much gallantry as was ever shown by any American soldier.

But I call attention to what we are now doing. There seems to be in the mind of my distinguished friend from Indiana, as well as my distinguished friend from Michigan, an opinion that we are trying to reverse the decision of a court-martial. There is no such thing contemplated; no such effort is being made; and I think that I will make that proposition clear before I conclude. What are we proposing? We are proposing to restore Fitz-John Porter to the Army. Do you say that we have no right to do that? I do not care whether the court that tried him was a legally constituted court or not. I do not care whether the court that investigated his conduct afterwards, the West Point board, was a legally constituted tribunal or not. The only question that presents itself for our consideration is this, was he justly condemned? And antecedent to that comes the question, was he guilty of the charges preferred against him?

But I return to the question, what are we doing now? We propose to request the President of the United States to place him on the rolls of the Army as a major-general of the United States, to ask the Senate to confirm that nomination, and if it sees fit, to restore him to the Army. You tell me that the sentence of the court-martial declared that he should not hold any office of trust or profit in the United States so long as he lived; that that was the finding and sentence of the court. But does any gentleman tell me here and now that Fitz-John Porter can not under all the laws of this country—will my gallant friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] tell me that under the law as it now stands, he can not hold any office of honor or profit or trust within the power of the President to confer or that the Congress of the United States may see fit to ask the President to give him?

Mr. STEELE. Will my distinguished friend from Kentucky tell me that the commission you are proposing to empower the President to give him, which is to date from the date of his dismissal from the Army, does not afford a vindication?

Mr. WOLFORD. I will answer the gentleman.

That is exactly in the line of the argument I propose to follow, and I will answer him fully. All we intend to do, all we ask for him, I will fully explain; and while I admire the manner in which the debate has been conducted, all I ask now is a fair hearing upon this floor. I assert that the day that his disability was removed by the pardon of the President he was in a position to hold any office of trust or profit under our Government. Will my distinguished friends from Indiana or Michigan, who have argued this question with so much zeal—mistaken zeal, I may say—assert that Fitz-John Porter has not as much right under a pardon from the Chief Executive to receive an office from the President of the United States as they have?

If you will not deny that, then we are not seeking, as the gentleman erroneously supposed, to bring in a reversal of the decision of the court-martial, but are simply seeking to vindicate the memory of a great, good, and gallant soldier of the United States against the aspersions which have rested upon him too long.

It will not be disputed that the President has pardoned Fitz-John Porter. The President pardoned him upon an investigation that took place at West Point; and I want to talk a little about that. I propose in the hour allotted to me to say that Fitz-John Porter acted as nobly at the very time you condemned him as he did at any time in his life. But I do not wish to enter upon the investigation of that question right now. I propose first to answer the argument that he was disloyal. I believe several gentlemen made that argument. I believe that my distinguished friend from Michigan made it. I believe it was made also by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana and by all the gentlemen who followed. They asserted that he was disloyal. They would not say in so many words that he was disloyal to his Government or to the Union cause. I honor them for not saying that. But they say he was disloyal to Pope. I believe I quote the gentlemen rightly as saying he was disloyal to Pope and hated Pope.

Disloyal to Pope! Are we to learn again that a man must be loyal to a man, to an individual? I am disloyal to any man that lives upon the earth. I hold I have no master, that is, under heaven. I have no master on the earth. I am loyal to my country. Every pulsation of my heart during the war beat for the success of the Union cause. I am loyal to my country to-day, but I hold no loyalty to any man, to any individual. Will my excellent friend from Michigan and other gentlemen who have argued on that side of the case rise here in their seats and say now they were loyal to a man? It was right not to be loyal to Pope.

I do not wish to say a single word against General Pope. I do not wish to pluck a laurel from his brow; but I say that General Porter had a right to be disloyal to Pope. He had a right to spurn with contempt anything that required him to be loyal to any man.

I want now for a few minutes to answer another argument. It has been said that his disloyalty to Pope made him disloyal—I believe that was the logical argument of my distinguished friend from Michigan—made him disloyal to his country for a time. Now, is that so? If it did, then Fitz-John Porter committed a grievous fault. All the gentlemen who have opposed the bill have supported the view before this House that Fitz-John Porter was disloyal and had forgotten his allegiance to the Government and to the United States. I suppose they meant to use the word disloyalty in that connection, and if they did not they will please correct me now, as synonymous with a lack of allegiance. They mean to say that for a moment he forgot his allegiance to the Government of the United States; that, for the time being, he forgot what he owed to the Government. I shall treat the argument in that way. Then I say that Fitz-John Porter was not a traitor. Do gentlemen argue that he was, that he was disloyal to his Government, that when standing in the front fighting a brave, and gallant, and powerful foe he was a traitor? I answer, the court-martial did not say that. If they understood the question as these learned gentlemen have argued before this House, if the court-martial which tried him had thought he was a traitor it would have been their duty to have ordered him to be shot. But they did not charge him with being a traitor. They only charged him with disobeying orders. And it is you gentlemen who now put that stigma upon his character and upon his conduct.

Before I undertake to investigate the facts and show that he did upon that day do his duty, I mean upon the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th August, I propose to draw a little distinction. Gentlemen speak of a court-martial as a constitutional court. I suppose they do not in earnest mean that the Constitution provides for a court-martial. I suppose neither my distinguished friend from Indiana nor my distinguished friend from Michigan would undertake to say a court-martial was established by the Constitution of the United States. But I want for a few minutes to draw a distinction between a court-martial and a court of law, and I will then come to the investigation of the facts in this case.

A court-martial has always been established in every country for the discipline of the army; nothing more, nothing less. A court-martial is summoned by a President of the United States, or by some commanding officer in the Army, and he selects the court. In a court of law every man put upon trial for his life and liberty would have a right to select the court. No such privilege is given to him in a court-martial, and the gentleman from Michigan will not say that it is.

There is a marked distinction between a court-martial and a court of law. In a court of law the law presumes the innocence of the accused from the moment he enters upon his trial until it ends; and you have to prove by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty before you can convict. In a court-martial the presumption is a man is guilty or he would not be charged, and he is brought forward for discipline.

Then in a court of law a man can bring evidence of his good character to rebut any testimony that may arise from such proof as to slight and immaterial matters as was introduced in the Fitz-John Porter case. In a court-martial the good character of a man is the very reason you convict him. And I assert here to-day one of the great reasons for the conviction of Fitz-John Porter is his good character. Now suppose that in a court of law you had had my friend from Michigan to testify to the good character of Fitz-John Porter, what a volume of testimony it would have taken to overcome the presumption of law and positive evidence of good character on the part of the accused. But when you come to try him by court-martial another rule prevails. The enlightened rules of jurisprudence have gone; another rule prevails. What is the main object of a court-martial? The sentence that will best secure discipline in the Army. And here, in a time of great excitement, when the whole country is filled with alarm at the defeat of our grand Army at Manassas, at a time when men trembled for the safety of the Union, you have a court-martial assembled—not assembled by Fitz-John Porter—to do what? To bring discipline to the Army; to teach men to obey.

General Porter was a bright and shining mark, one that everybody looked up to. In him we have an officer of rank and position. It will not do to take a private, because if we execute him it will amount to nothing. But here we have a brave and gallant and noble officer, and we can say that he has, in the letter, disobeyed orders. We will take that man and try him and find him guilty, in order to discipline the Army.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I would inquire of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] if he will not now yield to a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. BAYNE. That is just the suggestion I was about to make, the gentleman to continue to hold the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 42 minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WOLFORD. I will yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 28, 1884.

Prayer by Bishop M. SIMPSON, of Philadelphia.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting reports from Maj. Charles W. Raymond of the results of examinations and surveys of Fort Point channel and channel in Boston Harbor, of the headland in the town of Hull with a view to its protection by sea-wall, and of Ipswich River and Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass., with a view to the construction of a harbor of refuge thereat; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting reports from Maj. Charles J. Allen of the results of an examination of the lakes near the headwaters of Cannon River, and of the Minnesota River near the village of Belle Plain, in the State of Minnesota, with a view to adding to the reservoir system of the Mississippi; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting reports from Lieut. Col. William E. Merrill of the results of examinations and surveys of certain rivers, harbors, and channels in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report from Lieut. Col. Henry M. Robert of an examination, with plan and estimate, for a breakwater at Rouse's Point, Lake Champlain, New York; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a copy of a report from Capt. D. W. Lockwood of the result of an examination and a survey of the harbor at Cross Village, Mich., made under his direction, to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of papers inadvertently omitted from those transmitted to the Senate on the 9th instant and since printed as Executive Document No. 47, in response to resolution of December 4, 1883, calling for copies of correspondence relating to the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio in the nature of a memorial, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Joint resolution in reference to tariff on wool.

Whereas the Forty-seventh Congress reduced the tariff on imported wool against the protest of every wool-grower of the State of Ohio and the United States; and

Whereas the said reduction of tariff on imported wool discriminates against the wool-growers of the West in favor of the manufacturers of the East, thereby compelling the wool-growers of the West to compete with cheap wool of foreign countries, to their very great injury; and

Whereas that tariff was reasonable, and not too high before the reduction, and stands now at a rate so low as to injuriously affect that large and respectable class of people who have devoted themselves to wool-growing; and

Whereas an Ohio Congressman has already introduced a bill in the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress to restore the tariff on wool as it stood prior to the recent reduction, which should be passed at the earliest time possible: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators in Congress be, and are hereby, instructed; and our Representatives requested, to use all honorable means and vote for the bill to restore the tariff on wool as it stood prior to the recent reduction; and that the governor be requested to send a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives at Washington.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted January 23, 1884.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Board of Trade of the City of Gallipolis, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a marine hospital at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of L. S. Hitchcock, John McDonald, and 116 others, residents of the State of Michigan; and the petition of Thomas Costigan, Frederick S. Olson, and 29 others, residents of the State of Michigan, praying the forfeiture of the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad grant, and the protection of the title of private purchasers inside the same; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Wolf & Davidson and 3 others, steamship-owners of Milwaukee, Wis.; and the petition of Chipman & Raiser and 5 others, steamship and vessel owners of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 730) relating to steam and sail vessels navigating the ocean; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of the Medical Society of Northampton County, Pennsylvania, in favor of Congress authorizing the Public Printer to furnish Catalogues of the Library of the Surgeon-General's Office at the cost of manufacture to any person who may desire them; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of G. W. Hensel and 43 other citizens of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law to redeem the trade-dollar and suspend the coinage of the silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LAPHAM presented the petition of W. H. Huson, of Addison, N. Y., praying for the passage of a law to compensate him for property destroyed during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SLATER. I present a memorial of over 200 citizens of the State of Oregon, representing that for more than twenty years the odd-numbered sections of the public lands in a strip forty miles wide and about one hundred and forty miles long have been withdrawn from settlement for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railroad, to the great damage of the people and the State of Oregon, and praying that those lands be now restored to settlement. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER presented a petition of settlers within the limit of the lieu lands granted to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from The Dalles, Oreg., to the eastern line of the State, praying Congress to so amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on restored railroad lands," approved January 13, 1881, as to include the settlers on grants to military and wagon-roads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying that the land granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company be forfeited and restored to the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., representing that the interests of the Government would be promoted by the erection of a custom-house building in the city of Portland at a point convenient to the shipping and shipping interests; that the collector of customs and his staff of officials at present occupy insufficient quarters in the public building occupied in part for United States courts and a post-office, and that by reason of the construction of new lines of transportation and the growth of the country the quarters occupied by the post-office have become insufficient, and that it has become necessary either that further room should be provided by the construction of another building or by an addition to the present building; that an addition to the present building would render it unsightly, and that true economy and the interests of the Government demand the construction of a new building. I have already introduced a bill to that end, and I move that the memorial of the board of trade be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I also have a communication addressed to me personally, although relating entirely to public matters. It represents that under the donation law, as it is called, in Oregon, the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, donation claimants in Oregon were permitted to take their claims without reference to the sectional lines and legal subdivisions; that by reason of that there are scattered through the Willamette Valley, and in fact throughout the State of Oregon wherever donation claims are made, small fractions of public land from half an acre to five acres, or in some cases probably ten acres, which have been inclosed and are occupied by the original claimants or their successors, but which can not be sold under any existing law, and suggesting that some action ought to be taken by which such land may be sold, recommending also that it be donated to the State for educational purposes.

I ask unanimous consent to present the communication, and that it may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for investigation, and in order that some bill may be reported by which these fractions of public land may be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Public Lands a paper touching certain public land in Oregon addressed to him personally. If there be no objection, the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have had the honor of receiving through the mail this morning two communications. They are in print and seem to be identically the same. I will read the head-notes and all, as the papers are addressed to me, but intended to be a memorial to Congress:

Please fill up the blank in the memorial with the name of your post-office, then sign yourself. Secure such other signatures as you can, and mail to the Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, United States Senate:

Your petitioners, citizens of Little Rock, Ark., and vicinity, are gratified that the honorable Secretary of the Interior has asked Congress for an appropriation for education in Alaska. We would respectfully request you to secure from the Committee on Appropriations a favorable report for an appropriation for an industrial training-school at Sitka and for common schools at such points as may be designated by the United States Commissioner of Education.

Then their names are signed to the paper. There are two petitions, both from the State of Arkansas. I dislike to take upon myself the responsibility of representing the good citizens of that great State, but it seems that the friend who sent these circulars to them directed that they should be forwarded to me. I move that they be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Doubtless there will be plenty others of the same kind coming in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to present the papers which he has described for reference to the Committee on Appropriations. If there be no objection, the papers will be received and so referred.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of citizens of Mound City, Ill., praying that national aid be granted for public schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of officers of the Army stationed at Fort Hays, Kansas, praying that those who have served fifteen years either in the volunteer or regular service as captains or regimental staff officers may be allowed the pay and allowances of the next higher grade; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of D. M. Riordan, of Sante Fé, New Mex., with an accompanying map, praying for the extension of the Navajo Indian reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented three petitions of ex-soldiers, citizens of Missouri and Kansas, praying for the enactment of a general law for the relief of ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Chicago and Waukegan, praying that Herman Reifurath be made heir of his brother, Charles Reifurath, late of Company B, Twelfth Wisconsin Veterans, deceased, and that he be granted a pension, being a cripple; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Grand Army of the Republic Post No. 23, of Indiana, praying for the passage of a bill to open the Sioux reservation to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of C. E. Billings and others, of Hartford, Conn., members of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, praying for the passage of a bill for the appointment of a commission to continue the test of iron, steel, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Henry E. Williams, late second lieutenant Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, and other ex-officers of the Army, remonstrating against the clause in the bill for the relief of officers that deprives them of their just proportion of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of 74 members of the Washington Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Indiana, praying for the passage of a bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers in the late war for the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT. I present the petition of President Theodore D. Woolsey, of Yale College, and other distinguished citizens of Connecticut, praying for the passage of a law providing for the collection of divorce statistics with reference to the extraterritorial effect to be given to decrees of divorce. It has seemed to me that this subject is one peculiarly within the province of the Judiciary Committee, but I understand that petitions of this nature have been sent to the Committee on Education and Labor. I will therefore ask that the petition I now present be given the same reference.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will excuse me, I think there is great propriety in his suggestion that the subject-matter belongs to the Judiciary Committee, and I would suggest that the petitions which have been heretofore sent to the Committee on Education and Labor be recalled and the whole subject referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT. I will ask, at any rate, to have this petition referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be entered. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] asks unanimous consent that similar petitions which hitherto have been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor be recalled from that committee and sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know why they should not remain with the Committee on Education and Labor? I do not understand that Congress is supposed to have constitutional power to pass a law regulating divorces in the States of the Union that the Judiciary Committee could frame. Our legal power can be only over the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the legislation for both of those jurisdictions is committed to other committees. This, I understand, is a proposition for the collection of information, and it would seem to come within the precinct of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLATT. The object of collecting the information is for the purpose of ascertaining whether divorces in one State are valid in another; whether any law can be passed which shall remedy the difficulty that now exists by a divorce being obtained in one State which is not valid in another; and whether some legislation can not be devised which shall prescribe uniform causes for divorces in all the States. I do not know that Congress has any power to pass such a law, but certainly it seems to me that the Judiciary Committee is the appropriate committee to inquire into the subject.

Mr. HOAR. If that be the purpose, I shall not interpose.

Mr. BLAIR. It is quite obvious that there can be nothing in the nature of the collection of these statistics that is of any consequence whatever, because the only statistics that could be collected would be a compilation of the statute laws or of the condition of the existing laws of the various States and of the country at large. It seems to me if the matter is to be investigated at all, it must be by the Judiciary Committee. I am not aware of any special knowledge or any special function pertaining to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman which should make it the appropriate committee to consider this subject-matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to discharging the Committee on Education and Labor from the further consideration of the similar petitions hitherto referred to it? The Chair hears no objection. That committee is discharged, and the petitions will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER presented the petition of A. T. Young and 88 other citizens, of Marine City, Mich., praying for a survey of the banks of the Saint Clair River, to the end that the washing away of the banks and the filling in of the channel may be prevented; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio on the subject of the tariff on wool. Inasmuch as the resolution has been read at the request of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], I shall content myself with moving that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a petition of the Union Prisoners of War Association of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 44) for pensioning prisoners of war who were confined in confederate military prisons during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the Virgil Rogers Grand Army of the Republic Post No. 122, at Martinstown, Mo., praying for the passage of laws granting relief to ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that at some convenient time to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to consider both the bill and the joint resolution just reported.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1024) to authorize the State of California to select other lands in place of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, returned as mineral, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 233) providing for the enlargement and improvement of the post-office, custom-house, and court-house at New Haven, Conn., reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1283) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that the seventh section of this bill, which provides that no female shall hereafter vote in Utah Territory, does not meet with my approval, and I shall reserve my right as a Senator to ask the Senate to strike out that section when the bill comes up for consideration.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 9) making an appropriation for the improvement of the pool above the dam at the Rock Island arsenal, to report it without amendment, and I should like, if I can have consent, to put it upon its passage. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That to enable the Secretary of War to complete the improvement of the water pool above the dam at the Rock Island arsenal $11,000 are hereby appropriated out of any money not otherwise appropriated, and is made available on the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. VEST. Has it been just reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported at this time, and unanimous consent is asked that it be now considered.

Mr. VEST. I dislike exceedingly to make any objection, but if this sort of practice continues——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me just one moment, I will state that the reason why I did not say anything on the merits of the joint resolution was to see if there was objection, for I did not wish to take up the time of the Senate. The joint resolution was introduced early in the session, and the Appropriations Committee have not been together before to consider it. It was introduced at the earnest solicitation of the Secretary of War and the ordnance officer having in charge this work. A profile of the work and the letters of the Secretary of War and the officer in charge accompany the joint resolution. The basis for the measure at this time is the statement therein made that by appropriating this amount of money now certain work can be done which will protect the work at the time the freshets come in the spring season, whereas if it is allowed to go over until the general appropriation bill, probably the repairing of the damage done will cost three or four times the amount of money appropriated by the joint resolution for the protection of the work. The work lacks about that much of being completed, and by this immediate appropriation the officer in charge says he can preserve the work and save much money to the Government. This is the statement made by the officer in charge, which was referred to the Secretary of War, as I said, with a map and all, showing the work. I did not detain the Senate for the purpose of making this statement, because at the time the joint resolution was introduced I stated very fully the immediate necessity for action by Congress in reference to this particular work.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection to the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois, but I object to taking bills up out of their regular order. This morning a joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Appropriations which involves human life and human suffering, it being to appropriate a sum of money for the relief of certain Indians in Montana whom I know personally to be in a starving condition to-day. I did not call it up for the reason that I supposed the Senate had generally agreed, after the adoption of the new rules, not to renew the practice of considering bills the day they were reported. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make the point of order that I am unable to hear at all what has been said. I was unable to hear the bill read, and I do not know now its contents, but I was letting it pass. The reading of the bill was unheard by Senators around me as well as by myself, and all the remarks that have been submitted upon it, although doubtless interesting, failed to reach my ear. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please be in order, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will see that conversation and loud whispering in the galleries cease so that the business of the Senate may proceed. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Illinois, pending which the Senator from Michigan asks that it be again read? It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, insisted on by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WALDO HUTCHINS of New York, and Mr. W. H. CALKINS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S.

1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama;

A joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Antonio Barrios, of Guatemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MACKEY.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a member of the House from South Carolina, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolutions from the House of Representatives be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks, according to the usual course, that the Chair lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives concerning the death of one of its members. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a select joint committee, consisting of seven members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial; and the necessary expense attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Ordered, That Mr. PETTIBONE, Mr. BISBEE, Mr. O'HARA, Mr. WILLIS, Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, Mr. CALKINS, and Mr. HEMPHILL be the committee on the part of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the concurrence of the Senate in the resolution of the House respecting the appointment of a joint select committee, and suggest that the presiding officer of this body appoint the Senators to constitute the joint select committee on the part of the Senate to attend the obsequies of the deceased Mr. MACKEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House respecting the appointment of a joint select committee.

The resolution was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed? ["By the Chair."] The Chair will appoint, with the permission of the Senate, as the members of the committee to join the committee on the part of the House, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. BUTLER. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 28, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D.D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

TEXAS PACIFIC LAND GRANT.

Mr. PAYSON. The report of the Committee on Public Lands, No. 62, accompanying House bill No. 3933, to declare the forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes, by some mistake on the part of the Government Printer has never yet been sent to members through the post-office, and copies of the report which have been printed are scattered so that a sufficient number can not now be obtained for that purpose. As the report is deemed to be an important one, at least by the Committee on Public Lands, I ask unanimous consent of the House that it be ordered to be reprinted.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the circumstances I think that matter had better go over till to-morrow.

Mr. PAYSON. Very well.

DEATH OF HON. EDMUND W. M. MACKEY.

Mr. O'HARA. Since the adjournment of the House on Saturday last one of its members, Judge MACKEY, of South Carolina, has died. I submit for adoption the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a select joint committee, consisting of seven members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial; and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as the members, on the part of the House, of the joint committee authorized by the second of the foregoing resolutions:

Mr. A. H. PETTIBONE of Tennessee, Mr. HORATIO BISBEE, jr., of Florida, Mr. JAMES E. O'HARA of North Carolina, Mr. ALBERT S. WILLIS of Kentucky, Mr. WILLIAM H. CALKINS of Indiana, Mr. LOWNDES H. DAVIS of Missouri, and Mr. JOHN J. HEMPHILL of South Carolina.

And then, in pursuance of the last of the foregoing resolutions (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. YAPLE: The petition of members of A. W. Chapman Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Saint Joseph, Berrien County, Michigan, and members of Granger Post, Grand Army of the Republic, No. 142, of Bridgman, Mich., for increase of pension for deafness and loss of eyesight.

Also, the petition of members of Edwin Colwell Post, No. 23, Grand Army of the Republic, Michigan, for the passage of an act giving to each honorably discharged soldier, who served sixty days during the rebellion, 160 acres of land—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of citizens of Minnesota, for an appropriation for an industrial training-school at Sitka, Alaska, and for establishment of common schools at other points in Alaska by the Commissioner of Education—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, the petition of the Woman's Suffrage Association of Minnesota, for a constitutional amendment enfranchising women—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. G. D. WISE: Papers relating to the claim of P. L. Ward—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. YOUNG: Papers relating to the claim of Mary S. Hunt—to the same committee.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. ELIAS DE WITT HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama;

A joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Antonio Barrios, of Guatemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, recommending an appropriation for the payment of persons who have been, or may be, employed in or about the work of counting, canceling, and redeeming internal-revenue checks and proprietary stamps; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRISON. I present a petition of the common council of the city of Lawrenceburg, Ind., praying Congress to appropriate $150,000, with a view of strengthening a levee for the defense of that city against floods in the Ohio and Miami Rivers, and also protecting the navigation of the Ohio River. I desire to say that this city, with a population of some 6,000, has very important manufacturing interests, and pays from its distilleries from a million and a half to two million dollars annually to the United States. If the policy which seems to have been adopted in our legislation of protecting cities, and and even farms, from overflow by levees on the Mississippi River is to prevail there, I see no reason why it should not be extended to this city, situated upon one of the tributaries of that river, which has suffered most disastrously in some recent floods by overflow.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of a number of citizens of the town of Fargo, in the Territory of Dakota, praying for certain amendments to the laws upon the subject of pensions. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I also present certain papers in the nature of evidence in support of the claim of John F. Lewis, of Great Bend, Kans., for whose relief a bill is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of T. S. Winn, G. T. Willis, John M. Coleman, John King, Dr. W. A. Shands, J. W. Atkinson, Rev. J. B. Harolson, and others, citizens of Hernando County, Florida, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of Crystal River and its channels, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR. I present resolutions of the New Hampshire State Grange, composed of representative farmers of one hundred towns in that State, protesting against the reduction of the tariff upon wool by the recent act of Congress and against any proposed further reduction of the same as injurious and ruinous to the agricultural interests, and especially to the wool-growing interests of that State. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of the Monominee Mining Company and other owners of land within the limits of the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company land grant, praying that the titles of private owners within that grant be confirmed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented resolutions adopted by the trustees of the city of Sacramento, Cal., in regard to a proposed Indian policy; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of the Pacific coast, remonstrating against any reduction in the present tariff duties upon lumber; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE MACKEY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution that the funeral ceremonies of the late EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative in the House from the State of South Carolina, be held in the Hall of the House on Wednesday, January 30, at 1 o'clock p. m., and directing the Clerk to communicate the resolution to the Senate, and inviting the Senate to attend the funeral ceremonies.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 742) granting a pension to Nathan L. Meands;

A bill (S. 650) for the relief of Elizabeth Gordon; and

A bill (S. 837) granting a pension to Mary Joyce.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 189) granting a pension to Amos C. Weeden, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 528) for the relief of Silas Q. Home, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 590) amending clause 2 of section 2426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to persons in the naval service of the United States entitled to bounty land-warrants, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 592) for the relief of William Porter, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 217) to amend section 3734 of the Revised Statutes and to provide for the erection of public buildings by contract with the lowest bidders, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 933) for the relief of the estate of H. H. Dalrymple, deceased, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 321) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 425) to repeal the timber-culture laws, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 551) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, reported it with amendments.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3926) to repeal the act of July 2, 1862, and such sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States as perpetuate the oath prescribed in said act, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 350) for the relief of the estate of Thomas L. Price, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 1) for the payment of certain moneys to the Crow Indians and the confederated tribes of Flathead, Kortenay, and Pen d'Oreilles Indians, in Montana Territory, reported it favorably, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and the joint resolution was so referred.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 314) granting a pension to John C. Hughes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 279) granting a pension to Alfred M. Jarboe, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 777) granting a pension to Albert Jehle, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

DETAIL OF PENSION-OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees, to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration. It should take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, if in his opinion the public interests will not suffer thereby, upon the request of either of the committees hereinafter named, to detail from that Department one clerk to act as assistant clerk to the House Committee on Pensions, and one clerk to act as assistant clerk to the House Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senate will listen just one moment I will state that the object of the joint resolution, practically, is simply to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to designate two clerks to take charge of the pension papers relating to the cases pending in the House of Representatives. A great deal of confusion has arisen in that respect and the Commissioner is anxious to have some one representing his Department to have charge of the papers. Incidentally these committees of the House are also anxious to have such a detail made, because they say that the advice of such persons from the Pension Office will be of very great advantage to those committees. I trust the joint resolution will pass.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1284) granting pensions to all persons who, having enlisted in the regular or voluntary Army or Navy of the United States in any wars waged by the United States, served three months, were honorably discharged, and who are unable by reason of physical disability to earn their subsistence, or who are sixty-five years of age and are dependent upon their own labor for support, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1285) for the relief of J. L. Whitaker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1286) for the relief of Henrietta M. Sands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1287) for the relief of Juliet H. Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1288) for the relief of Nathaniel C. Bateman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SLATER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1289) supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 1290) for the relief of William H. Hunt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1291) to quiet and confirm the title to certain lands in the Saginaw Bay, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1292) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1293) providing for the distribution to members of Congress of ten charts and other publications of the Hydrographic Office for each session of Congress; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to the House of Representatives shall each be entitled to ten charts or other publications of the Hydrographic Office for each regular session of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. At the suggestion of the officer in charge, who says that he has no power to send such charts to members who require them for their constituents, I have introduced the bill instead of a resolution. I ask that it may be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. I never object to the consideration of any Senator's bill, but the morning hour is somewhat precious, at least to some of us who are behind in our business. If this measure is going to take any length of time I should be glad to transact morning business myself first.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose it will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for information whether the Senator knows how many charts it would include, and whether he can give us any information about the expense?

Mr. CONGER. These charts are all published, and they are furnished to the captains of vessels and to those interested in the subject now; but members have requests for the charts from their constituents, and the officer in charge says he has no authority to give them in that way until Congress orders it. They may not be needed by any member, but if requested by constituents he may send them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is bad policy to introduce a bill and pass it through all its stages in the Senate on the day of its introduction. I do not know when I have seen it done. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1294) enlarging the powers of the Washington Safe Deposit Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1295) relative to the claims of certain Northern creditors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 1296) for the relief of Mrs. Henrietta H. Cole; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1297) for the relief of W. H. Huson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1298) to constitute the city of Washington, D. C., a port of entry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1299) to increase the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1301) to empower Morgan, Orr & Co. to bring suit in the Court of Claims for taxes erroneously paid; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1302) for the relief the First National Bank, of Portland, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1303) to grant the right of way over the public lands of the United States to the Lost Lake and Mount Hood Improvement Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1304) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the expenses incurred by the Territorial authorities and the people of the Territory of Idaho in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1877 and 1878, known as the Bannock and Nez Percé outbreaks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1305) for the relief of John S. Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1306) to fix the rate of pensions in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1307) abolishing the office of Assistant Surgeon-General of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1308) to grant arrears of pension to the widow of Milton Searle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 1310) to abolish the military reservation of Fort Rice, in the Territory of Dakota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein surveyed and made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1311) vacating all that portion of the Fort Randall military reservation, in the Territory of Dakota, lying east of the Missouri River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1312) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1313) establishing the Territory of North Dakota and providing a temporary government therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KENNA (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1315) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JACKSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1316) for the relief of William W. Armstrong; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1317) appropriating $150,000 for the improvement of the Miami and Ohio Rivers at and near the city of Lawrenceburg, Ind.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present in connection with this bill the proceedings and resolutions adopted in the common council of the city of Lawrenceburg on this subject. I move that they be referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES also introduced a bill (S. 1318) for the relief of William B. Browne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1319) for payment to Thomas McMahon for labor and services rendered under Peter McNamara, a contractor of the board of public works, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAMAR introduced a bill (S. 1320) for the relief of Mrs. Emily Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALL introduced bill (S. 1321) for the improvement of Manatee River from Hamer to Mitchellville, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GROOME asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. 1322) granting a pension to Jane Welsh; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1323) to increase the pension of David J. Whitman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1324) to increase the pension of William Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1325) granting an increase of pension to Merlin C. Harris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1326) to compel the prosecution of proceedings in bankruptcy to a final decree; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1327) to amend section 604 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENDLETON introduced a bill (S. 1328) to establish consular and other courts and to define their jurisdiction, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1329) appropriating $200,000 for continuing the improvement of the Missouri River near Wyandotte, Kans., and Kansas City, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1330) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel B. Colby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the National Bank of Newton, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1332) for the relief of Joseph Walker & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1333) to provide for the erection of a post-office building at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 1334) granting arrears of pension to Mary Ringgold Archer, widow of Robert H. Archer, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1335) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of the late John V. B. Bleeker, late paymaster in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further bills, resolutions are in order. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on a former occasion, which has not yet been reached in the order of resolutions. According to the explanation that the Chair made the other day, under the new rules the Chair thinks that this is the only time for the laying before the Senate of resolutions which have been heretofore offered and objected to. The Chair therefore lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, if Senators desire to submit formal resolutions this morning, to have the pending resolution lie over informally. I am prepared to address the Senate on the resolution, but I do not want to interfere with the ordinary current run of business if Senators have such business to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio is before the Senate for consideration, pending which the Senator from Ohio states that he has no objection to the formal introduction of orders and resolutions which do not lead to debate.

The Chair will receive, if there be no objection, the ordinary routine resolutions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of William Hunter be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Anson Atwood be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims, in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That W. H. Powell is hereby permitted to withdraw from the files of the Secretary of the Senate the papers relating to his claim.

On motion of Mr. SLATER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the bill for the relief of sufferers by the wreck of the Government transport-bark Torrent be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration in connection with Senate bill 622, now pending before said committee, there having been a favorable report in this case and the bill having passed the Senate during the Forty-seventh Congress.

On motion of Mr. MCPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the heirs of George McDougall be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAY OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, in the adjustment of the salaries and pay of postmasters under the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, and whether, in his opinion, any further legislation is necessary on this subject.

TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

Mr. PLATT. I offer the resolutions which I send to the Chair, and ask for their present consideration. If the resolutions should lead to debate, of course they will be objected to. I ask that they may be read for information.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads are hereby instructed to inquire whether the cost of telegraphic correspondence between the several States and Territories of the United States, or with foreign countries, has been injuriously affected by large stock dividends made by the Western Union Telegraph Company, by consolidations between different telegraph companies, by working contracts with cable or other companies, by the leasing of connecting or competing lines, or by other means.

Resolved, That said committee further inquire whether the Western Union Telegraph Company directly, or through the Gold and Stock Telegraph Company, or any other company or association, have prescribed rules or regulations for the transmitting of press news, or made differential rates, whereby discriminations are made restricting the free and independent use of the telegraph by the press.

Resolved, That the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer, and report by bill or otherwise, and in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an important matter. I object to the present consideration of the resolutions. Let them be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to the present consideration of the resolutions. They will be printed and go over.

REPRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bill 140 to establish a bureau of statistics of labor; Senate bill 141 to fix and regulate the hours of laborers and workmen and mechanics employed by the Government of the United States; and Senate bill 398 to provide temporary aid to common schools, be reprinted, the files being exhausted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XIX provides that "every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter," &c., "shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing." The statute requires that if the expense of additional copies exceeds $500 every such motion to print additional copies shall go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know how great the expense may be. They are very short bills. The usual number has once been printed, but the copies have been exhausted. When the committee came to consider the bills we could find no copies. We simply want them reprinted for use.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds in the second paragraph of Rule XIX a positive direction that motions of this character shall go to the Committee on Printing:

Motions to print additional numbers shall also be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing. I should like to have the committee take early cognizance of the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will direct that the order be referred to the Committee on Printing.

LIST OF PENSIONS BY SPECIAL ACT.

Mr. BLAIR. I present, by direction of the Committee on Pensions, a document received from the Pension Office in reply to a communication from the committee asking for a list and some data with reference to those officers of the Army and Navy who either themselves or their widows have received pensions by special act. It is a document of considerable consequence to the committee in its deliberations, and may be to the Senate, and possibly to the other House. I ask to have it printed, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, if that reference must be made so that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that as it is not an additional number the usual order to print may be entered without a reference.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the document, the nature of which the Senator from New Hampshire has stated will be printed for the use of the Senate. That order is entered.

DISTRICT PRISONERS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg leave to offer a resolution, and ask unanimous consent that it be put on its passage this morning.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate the following information:

1. How many persons have been convicted of crime and sentenced by the supreme court of the District of Columbia to imprisonment in any penitentiary since January 1, 1873?

2. How much money has been paid out of the public moneys of the United States for the transportation of such prisoners and their necessary guards since June 1, 1873?

3. At what prisons have such persons been confined in execution of sentences of said court, and how much money has been paid by the United States for the maintenance and support of such persons so imprisoned since June 30, 1873?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will suggest a verbal correction of that resolution that the Attorney-General be "directed" instead of "requested."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not hear whether the Senator objected or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not object.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will state that the only purpose of the resolution is to get at some information that is necessary to enable an intelligent report to be made in answer to petitions that have come up from the District of Columbia in reference to the building of a penitentiary here.

Mr. ANTHONY. I merely suggested that the word "directed" be used instead of the word "requested."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be modified to read "directed," according to the customary course of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

FREE POSTAGE FOR PRINTED MATTER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution for the purpose of taking off a tax the Government does not need and which I regard as very unjust:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of admitting all newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter to the United States mails free of postage, and said committee to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL IMPROVEMFNT.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will be willing to allow without objection the joint resolution (S. R. 9) making an appropriation for the improvement of the pool above the dam at the Rock Island arsenal to be voted on. It was just about being acted upon by the Senate yesterday when a message came from the House which caused an early adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather go on with the resolution offered by me.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is a word of debate on this matter I shall not press it now. It is very important that it shall be passed at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. If it will not lead to debate I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to call up at this time for consideration the joint resolution indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 9) making an appropriation for the improvement of the pool above the dam at the Rock Island arsenal. To enable the Secretary of War to complete the improvement of the water pool above the dam at the Rock Island arsenal $11,000 are appropriated by the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call now for the reading of the resolution which is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN January 24, 1884:

Whereas among the expressed objects for which the Constitution of the United States was established were those to establish justice and insure domestic tranquillity; and

Whereas the Constitution provides for the security to all citizens of equal civil rights and to all citizens the privileges and immunities that belong to the condition of citizenship, and that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied by the United States, or any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and further provides "that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws;" and

Whereas among the privileges and immunities inherent in citizenship are the right peaceably to assemble for the consideration of questions of State and national concern and safely to discuss the same, and the right to exercise the elective franchise in every State freely and without molestation or intimidation; and

Whereas a general election was to occur, and did occur, in the State of Virginia on the 6th day of November, 1883; and

Whereas it is alleged and currently reported in the public press that on or about the 3d day of November, 1883, at Danville, in said State, a large number of peaceable citizens of the United States and of said State were violently assailed by an organized body of men and fired upon, and several of them killed, by said armed men, conspiring to affect, and with the purpose of affecting, the result of said election so about to occur, by creating, by means of such unlawful violence and homicide, a state of alarm on the part of peaceable citizens throughout said State, which should induce them to refrain from voting or to vote differently from their previous intentions at said election; and

Whereas it is alleged that all the victims of said attack were of one race and of one political party, and all their assailants of another; and

Whereas it is alleged that the authorities of said State of Virginia have not brought any of the persons connected with said alleged conspiracies, violence, and homicides before the courts of justice for examination or trial, whereby the equal rights of citizenship and the equal protection of the laws have not been secured to all the people of said State; and

Whereas a general election was to occur, and did occur, in the State of Mississippi on the 6th day of November, 1883; and

Whereas it is alleged and currently reported in the public press that prior to said election, in the county of Copiah, State of Mississippi, there was an organized movement by members of one party to prevent members of another party from voting at that election and to prevent the free and open discussion and expression of political opinions; that this purpose was carried into execution by organized plans of terror and violence; that the means used for that purpose were by lawless and organized mobs, moving by night and by day, assaulting, and in some cases killing, lawful voters, with a view, by terror and fear of violence, to deter others from voting; that this violence was committed by one party upon the members of another party, with a view to deprive the latter of their constitutional rights, and extended throughout the said county of Copiah and into portions of other counties of that State; that, as a part of this general plan and conspiracy, one J. P. Matthews, a peaceable and law-abiding citizen of Copiah County, was warned not to vote, and upon his voting on the day of election was murdered at the place of election by a person selected for that purpose, and with the approval, express or implied, of the officers of election, and no effort was made to punish the murderers; that this killing was subsequently approved by a public meeting in said county, composed strictly of members of one party, and the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas certain rumors are current that the relatives of the late J. P. Matthews have threatened the peace of society, in order to avenge his death, by killing Democrats and destroying their property; Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the people of Copiah County in mass-meeting assembled this day at the court-house of said county, That if any person shall be injured, or an attempt made to injure him, either in person or in property, in any manner, by the said relatives or friends of said J. P. Matthews, we hereby declare that we will hold his said relatives and friends who participate accountable for the same, and that we will regard them as without the pale and protection of the law and common enemies of society, and that we will visit upon them certain, swift retribution.

"Be it further resolved, That so long as the friends and relatives of the said J. P. Matthews obey the laws and become good citizens, we hereby pledge them the protection of the law.

"Resolved further, That in the opinion of this meeting it is necessary to the safety of society and the welfare of all races and classes in this county that the Matthews family shall keep out of politics in Copiah County.

"Resolved further, That from henceforth no man or set of men shall organize the negro race against the whites in this county, and if it shall be attempted in the future, we hereby give notice that it shall be at the peril of the person or persons attempting so to do.

"Resolved, That we do hereby pledge ourselves, each to the other, our lives and fortunes and our sacred honor, that we will, all and individually, from henceforth, hold ourselves in readiness to enforce the foregoing resolutions, and to meet at any time upon the call of the chairman of this meeting.

"Resolved, That a committee of twenty-four from each supervisor's district be appointed by the chair to present a copy of these resolutions to the brothers and sons of the late J. P. Matthews, and that the same be published in the Copiah Signal and the Crystal Springs Meteor.

"Resolved by the citizens of Copiah County in mass meeting assembled, That the honors heretofore worn, and worthily so, by beat No. 2 be, and the same are hereby, awarded to beat No. 3.

"Be il further resolved, That this resolution is by no means intended to reflect upon the past and present services of beat No. 2, but to show our appreciation of the result of the election of the ticket in beat No. 3.

"It is also resolved, That the clubs continue their organizations, and consider themselves not disbanded, subject to the call of the chairman of the Democratic executive committee.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be extended to the Hazlehurst brass band for their services on this occasion.

"J. L. MEADE, Chairman.

"JESSE THOMPSON, Jr.,
"C. J. ALLEN,
"Secretaries."

And whereas it is alleged that the authorities of the State of Mississippi have utterly failed and neglected to protect and preserve to the citizens of that State the equal enjoyment of civil and political rights, but have in some cases contributed to their overthrow, and have failed to punish or bring to trial persons alleged to be guilty of the conspiracies, violence, and homicides above stated, in disregard of the equal rights of citizenship in the equal protection of the law guaranteed to all the people of that State: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into all the circumstances of, and connected with, the said alleged events, and into the condition of the constitutional rights and securities before named of the people of Virginia and Mississippi, and that it report, by bill or otherwise, as soon as may be; and that it have the power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sittings of the Senate, and that it may employ a stenographer or stenographers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, since the beginning of the present session I have felt that the recent events in the States of Virginia and Mississippi were of such importance as to demand a full and impartial investigation of the causes which led to them, of the real facts involved, and of the proper constitutional remedy to prevent their recurrence, and, if necessary, to further secure to all American citizens freedom of speech in the open assertion of their political opinions and in the peaceful exercise of their right to vote.

Now that sufficient time has elapsed to allay to some extent the excitement caused by these events, I hope the Senate will make this investigation, so that our citizens in every State may understand how far the National Government will protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, or if it is helpless or listless, that, no longer relying upon the barren declarations of the Constitution, each man for himself may appeal to the right of self-defense or to the boasted American right of migration to more friendly regions.

The allegations in this resolution as to the Danville riot or massacre are founded upon statements in the public prints, supported by the oaths of witnesses, and their substantial truth is also verified by the published statement of a member of this body, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

The allegations as to Mississippi are founded upon copious narratives in the public prints, the proceedings of public meetings, and the actions and failure to act of officers of the State government, including governors, judges, courts, and juries.

I have not deemed it proper at this stage of the investigation, if it is to be made, to enter into the details of the facts, although I have before me a voluminous collection of all these various statements published in the papers of different political parties and from different persons.

If these statements are true, then in both these States there have been organized conspiracies to subvert the freedom of elections, accompanied by murder and violence in many forms. The crimes depicted are not ordinary crimes, common in all societies where the criminal falls under the ban of public justice, and is pursued by officers of the law, tried, convicted, or acquitted; but the crimes here alleged are that a prevailing majority subverts by violence the highest constitutional rights and privileges of citizens, and can not from their nature be inquired of or punished by ordinary tribunals. If they are true, then in those communities the members of one party and race have no rights which the prevailing party is bound to respect.

It is not well to assume these allegations to be true without the fullest investigation and inquiry by the legislative power, for, if true, the gravest questions of public policy arise that we have been called upon to consider since the close of the civil war. I have no desire to open up sectional questions or to renew old strifes, but would be glad to turn my back upon the past and devote myself to questions of peace, development, and progress. Still, if these allegations are true, it would be a cowardly shrinking from the gravest public duty to allow such events to deepen into precedents which would subvert the foundation of republican institutions and convert our elections into organized crimes. I do not say these allegations are true, but they come to us with such apparent seeming of truth that we are bound to ascertain their truth or falsehood by the most careful and impartial inquiry.

If the events at Danville were the result of a chance outbreak or riot between opposing parties or different races of men, they may properly be left to be dealt with by the local authorities; but if the riot and massacre were part of machinery, devised by a party to deter another party or a race from the freedom of elections or the free and open expression of political opinions, then they constitute a crime against the National Government, the highest duty of which is to maintain, at every hazard, the equal rights and privileges of citizens.

If the events in Copiah County, Mississippi (which is a large and populous county, containing twenty-seven thousand inhabitants, and evidently a very productive county), were merely lawless invasions of individual rights, then, though they involved murder as well as other crimes, they should be left to local authority, and if justice cannot be administered by the courts, and the citizen is without remedy from lawless violence, then he must fall back upon his right of self-defense, or, failing in that, he must seek a home where his rights will be respected and observed. But if these individual crimes involve the greater one of an organized conspiracy of a party or a race to deprive another party or race of citizens of the enjoyment of their unquestioned rights, accompanied with overt acts, with physical power sufficient to accomplish their purpose, then it becomes a national question, which must be dealt with by the National Government.

The war emancipated and made citizens of five million people who had been slaves. This was a national act, and whether wisely or imprudently done it must be respected by the people of all the States. If sought to be reversed in any degree by the people of any locality, it is the duty of the National Government to make its act respected by all its citizens. It is not now a question as to the right to stop at an inn, or to ride in a car, or to cross a bridge, but it is whether the people of any community can by organized fraud, terror, or violence prevent a party or a race of citizens from voting at an election, or the expression of opinions, or denying to them the equal protection of the law. No court has ever denied the power of the National Government to protect its citizens in their essential rights as freemen. No man should be allowed to hold a seat in either House of Congress whose election was secured by crimes such as are depicted here.

Nor is it sufficient to say that the elections referred to were not national elections in the sense that they did not involve the election of a President or of a member of Congress. While the power of Congress over the election of Senators, Representatives, and the President extends to making and altering laws and regulations passed by the respective States, and therefore is fuller than in respect to State elections, yet the Constitution provides that "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated;" that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States;" that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws;" and that "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It was also declared that "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any Department or officer thereof." Power is also given to Congress to enforce the recent amendments by appropriate legislation.

If the essential rights of citizenship are overthrown by a State or by the people of a State with the sanction of the local authorities within the limits of the State, then Congress, as the legislative power of the United States, is bound to provide additional safeguards, and should exhaust all the powers of the United States Government to maintain these essential rights of citizenship within the limits of all the States in as full and complete a manner as it will guard and protect the unquestioned rights of citizens of the United States within the domains of the most powerful nations of the world. Surely a citizen of the United States has as much right in any one of the States as he would have in a foreign land, however remote or how powerful its government may be. Protection at home in the secure enjoyment of the rights of person and property is the foundation of all human government, without which its forms are a mockery and with which mere forms of government become a matter of indifference. Protection goes with allegiance, and allegiance ceases to be a duty when protection is denied.

I can appreciate the great change that has occurred in the Southern States, the natural antagonisms which would arise by the emancipated slaves mingling in the same community with their former masters with equal civil and political rights with those who had held them as slaves; I can pardon the prejudices of race, of caste, and even of local ties; and the American people have, I think, waited with great forbearance, waited patiently for the time when constitutional rights would be respected without regard to race, or color, or creed, or party. If the time has come, as alleged in the papers before me, when members of the Republican party, through whose agency largely the existence of the Government has been maintained intact over the broad extent of our country, can not express their free opinions, can not enjoy their constitutional rights, are murdered at the ballot-box without fear on the part of their murderers of punishment, and driven from their homes by outrage and terror, and that white and black alike are subject to ostracism and injustice, and as a party are disfranchised in large portions of the regions where in war they asserted and maintained the powers of the National Government, then indeed is there demanded the most patient inquiry and a full, open, and manly assertion that the rights and equalities of citizens shall be maintained and enforced at every hazard.

If the Copiah resolutions are the creed of the Democratic party in the South, then indeed is the war a failure, and we must expect again the fierce sectional excitement, deepened by injury and disappointment. Written in the light of the events alleged to have transpired in the presence of the men who wrote and adopted these resolutions, they seem to me the very germ of despotism and barbarity, and yet I am assured by a gentleman friendly to them that they are the creed of nine-tenths of the party in power in Mississippi. I should like to know—it is right that we should learn—the groundwork of opinions so utterly repugnant to Republican institutions.

In this investigation I would seek every palliation or excuse for the conduct of the people complained of. I would give to their motives and to the natural feelings of mankind in their situation the most charitable construction. I would give to them all the political power they ever enjoyed, and, without unkindness, or pains, or penalties, or even reproaches, I would extend to them every right, favor, or facility that is enjoyed by any citizen in any part of our country; but when this concession is made to them I would demand that in the States under their control the freedom and equality of rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws to all citizens, white or black, native or naturalized, poor or rich, ignorant or learned, Republican or Democrat, shall be secured by the State government, or, if not, that their rights and privileges shall be asserted and maintained by the National Government. Upon this issue I would appeal to every generous-minded man, to every lover of his country, to every one who wishes to enjoy his own rights by his own fireside free from embarrassment, to stand by those who, yielding to others the protection of the laws in the enjoyment of equal rights, will demand the same for themselves and for their associates.

Mr. President, this is all I desire to say at this time on the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, it behooves me in the name of Virginia to express regret that there should be found in the conduct of any portion of her constituency occasion for such inquiry as that on which the resolution before the Senate is in part predicated.

That it has come and is known of all men I do not hesitate to confess, but neither for the conception nor for the incendiary proceedings which inspired and led up to the violent overthrow of the civil law and the unprovoked brutal murder of unarmed citizens, painfully conspicuous at Danville, I protest are the real majority of her people in any wise responsible.

It is due to her fair name, and to the love of that people for liberty and their respect for law, their devotion to the free and unhindered exercise of the rights and privileges of citizenship, that such contrary and vicious methods, such lawless proceedings as characterized the conduct of the Bourbon party now and here at Danville, culminating in high crime against the laws of man and Creator, should be exposed; it is but just to the unstained character of her people that both the actors and the conspirators in these foul deeds, done within her borders, in contempt of the civilization of the age and the Constitution and laws of both the State and National Governments, should be brought to the bar of public opinion if they can not be under the hand of a righteous administration of justice.

At no time in the glorious history of Virginia until the late canvass and election for the Legislature has the sentiment found root with any party that political ends may be achieved by such festering methods and means as gave rise to the Danville massacre, and the kindred proceedings, abuses, and disorders which marked the conduct of that political faction. Its leaders and organs, weary of ambition for place and of desire to dominate over a people who had repeatedly repudiated them and their shifting principles, openly advised any resort which might perchance give them the power.

That a reign of terror and lawlessness suppressed and superseded the functions of the civil law, restraining the liberties of the citizen and exposing human life to the disordered will and frenzied passions of a political mob, licensed by the teachings of its own political faction to enact such outrages as transpired at Danville, the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth in his general message to the Legislature sufficiently bears witness. He says:

> The condition of the State as to health and prosperity is such that congratulations may be exchanged. Providence has extended to our fields genial suns and refreshing rains. We have had bountiful harvests, increased industry, and a growing population.
> It is sad to mar this pleasant picture by alluding to an unhappy circumstance which all good people should pray God shall never be repeated in the State of Virginia. Far be it from the governor of this Commonwealth, whose duties are purely executive, to characterize or criticise, in any partisan sense, the trouble by which death and blood came on the 3d of November to many citizens in one of the cities of our State. There is no purpose here to ask your honorable body to investigate the matter. There is no right vested in the governor to do so. But the charge made against the State and that community—it can not be denied—is this: that men were killed, men were wounded, of no matter what party, of no matter what color; and that contrary to all the law-serving habit of this people no man has been accused, arrested, or tried for his part in the killing or wounding. This is the view of the affair in which all good people should join. Judicial investigation should be had, witnesses should be allowed to testify, should be made to testify, and the truth should be made apparent, so that the Commonwealth of Virginia should be placed before the world as one of the States which tries crime, no matter who may be the criminal.

The report of the grand jury following the calamity to which he refers but completes the damnable picture. That the law there in Danville and in that region fails of rightful supremacy and the power of maintaining order, peace, and the safety of organized society is paralyzed, let the murders and unprovoked attempts to take life, since the speaking picture at Danville, argue the force of this assertion.

The time has come, it occurs to me, when this Government should consider of its duty, where the local authority fails to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of the immunities guaranteed by the supreme law.

I hope, Mr. President, the proposed investigation will proceed, and that this whole matter may be probed to the bottom, and somewhere in the power of the nation the cure may be found for a political disease fraught, as I conceive, with grave concern to the safety of human life, the liberties of the citizen, the peace, welfare, and happiness of the nation, if not for the integrity of our own republican form of Government.

What consideration follows paramount allegiance if the right to live and to exercise the privileges common to citizenship and to enjoy the immunities of government do not inure and obligate the power of that government to secure them unto every citizen? Whatever may have been the wisdom or the unwisdom of the qualifications on which our citizenship is based, the Constitution is and should be the governing law, and its honest and cheerful observance the duty of all.

Virginia's unfortunate connection with the slavery institutions of a section lay at the bottom of the consideration which induced her to make, as reluctantly she did, common cause with the South in the sectional war which for a time separated her from the Union she had contributed so largely to found and, following the spirit of her Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, so earnestly endeavored to promote and preserve. But in resuming, Mr. President, her place here, and believing that the fratricidal contest had ended and should be forever closed by the event which transpired at Appomattox, Virginia came in good faith, declaring for the first time in her great history that this was a nation, she a part of it, the Union indissoluble, and that its Constitution and laws were paramount and superior in every State.

Her people have faithfully endeavored to observe these solemn declarations and have honestly labored to establish, as they have done, equal citizenship, and never until now have any portion of her constituency sought to evade and destroy that duty by resort to violence.

Such methods are in conflict with the temper, habits, traditions, and convictions of her people, and are shocking to the moral sense of the State.

The sentiment which instigated them, and of which was born the foulest crime that has ever been committed upon the soil of Virginia within the memory of living men—the massacre at Danville of unarmed, unresisting, fleeing colored people—must not, I protest, be left, for the lack of full and authoritative investigation, to cloud her noble escutcheon.

Let it be fastened upon the political leadership of the faction to which it singularly belongs, and which now condones and seeks to screen from exposure and punishment the lawless proceedings and bloody deeds committed in that behalf.

In the name of her civilization and her high esteem for the respect and good-will of the Christian family this investigation is invoked.

It is of no measurable consequence what the fate of political parties where questions of human right and the character of a great Commonwealth are imperiled.

No State of those engaged on the Southern side in the unhappy sectional war had more thoroughly, cordially, and sincerely acquiesced in the result and turned her face to the morning of an indissoluble Union, one and inseparable—a nation forever.

Dismembered as she had been as a consequence of her loyalty to the right as she believed, and lacerated as she was by the ravages of contending armies, embarrassed by the loss of millions of values, a disorganized labor system, and by an unadjusted accumulated public debt, yet her manhood with surprising individuality and energy addressed all its power to the prodigious work of regeneration.

The rapid and substantial strides she has made in every phase of human progress answers for the grade of prosperity she had reached.

Liberty of thought and freedom of political action had been set at will and the qualifications of the elector disencumbered of any other condition than prescribed by the letter and spirit of the supreme law.

The sources of free education had been advanced over a hundred-fold, and the spirit for learning had been incited to the full measure of the opportunity.

Ample provision had been added for the proper care and treatment of the afflicted members of every community; the barbarous feature of a degenerated code—the whipping-post—had been abolished, and every discrimination incompatible with the rights of citizenship, as ordained by the Constitution and laws of both the State and National Governments, had been removed.

A carefully formulated settlement of the greatly misunderstood and long embarrassing question of the public debt had been reached, which both as to item and method remains unimpeached and unimpeachable, finally receiving the highest sanction known to any code, the sanction of the self-styled "honor and honesty" faction of the State.

The credit of the State had been restored to its aforetime integrity, her indebtedness to asylums, schools, colleges, &c., amounting to quite $2,000,000 (besides arrearages of interest aggregating five and a half millions), had been reduced to less than $725,000, with a million and a half cash in her treasury.

The expenses of government had been reduced full 25 per cent. and the rate of taxation 20.

Enterprise, thrift, and well-doing marked the labors of the people in all the employments of life.

Peace, prosperity, and the sunshine of a larger future beamed in all her borders, and inspired all ranks and conditions of her people.

Sectional asperities had passed away and cordial relations with our brethren of the nation were honestly cultivated.

Responding to a rancorous sentiment, re-enforced by a diseased and uncontrollable ambition for place and power, it was to prevent the continued success of the party which had inaugurated such an era of wholesome reforms, peace, plenty, and good-will toward men, that an unscrupulous leadership of a political faction conceived and contrived by such agencies to defeat the honest will of a majority of the people at the election on the 6th of November last and to force a result in its own favor.

The scheme was by the shot-gun practice and other means of compulsion to frighten and restrain the colored voter from exercising his constitutional rights of franchise and by inciting and promoting the prejudices of caste and a conflict of blood—to compel the more irresolute, less informed, and more dependent class of white voters to abandon their own political faith and to indorse a leadership and principles which had been repeatedly condemned at the polls.

But, Mr. President, I forbear to enter now upon the facts which are to be the subject of the proposed investigation further than may be incident to a discussion of the powers of Congress over the matter.

Here in connection with the exercise of a right guaranteed by the Constitution, on which the very integrity of this Government rests, a number of wanton murders have been committed which have not been prosecuted nor can be made the subject of judicial investigation, as appears.

The murdered men all belong to a race or a class who are, notwithstanding and none the less, citizens of the State and of the United States, entitled as such to the protection of the laws, the privileges of the ballot, and enjoyment of liberty.

These murders which, in the dawn of civilization, "when the rough feelings of barbarism had not experienced the softening touches of time, would have needed the gloss of apology," are charged to have been of political design, and the exculpation of the participants is alleged to be part of the same political object, that object being to deprive by intimidation of their right of suffrage a race of citizens who are guaranteed it by the Constitution of the United States, and who, on the assumption that they are free to enjoy the exercises of that right, are counted to a man in making up the apportionment of representation allowed to each State in the popular branch of the National Legislature and in the electoral college of the Union; while failure to punish such crimes, and to protect the citizen in the full and safe pursuit of that right, is expected to operate, as reasonably it must, to lower his manhood, circumscribe his energies and his productive capacity, lessen his respect for the Government and his love of country, and finally to subdue his honest convictions or work him out as a political factor.

Where shall the inquiry be instituted if not here in the Congress of the United States whether representation conforms to the theory of the organic law?

If a State enjoys representation in Congress on the faith that the right of suffrage is free to all its legally qualified voters, it is a breach of faith with the other States of the Union to deprive any class or any part of any class of voters of this right.

The enforcement of any such restriction, no matter the device or the means employed, nor the measure of the result, is a wrong to other States of the Union and an assault upon the spirit of the Constitution which I submit it is the duty of Congress not only to investigate but to rebuke and correct.

There is, Mr. President, another even broader ground than this, if broader there can be, on which this power of Congress to inquire into such matters rests. The United States by constitutional obligation guarantees to each State a republican form of government, that is to say a form of government in which the unhindered will of the majority of the legally qualified voters controls the administration of its public affairs. If by murder or any kind of violence this will of the majority is overthrown and those who commit the murders go unwhipped of justice, or other acts of violence designed to substitute the will of a minority for that of a majority are allowed impunity, then we have a government wherein the minority governs, governs by the practice of fraud and of crime, and therefore a government that is not republican.

The Union was formed on the fundamental condition, mutually pledged between the States, that it was to be a union of republics, and that each State would preserve a republican form of government; and it is a high duty that Congress owes to all the States that such government in fact and in spirit as well as in form be maintained. When, therefore, it appears that in any State the elective franchise is so far overthrown by lawless practices which the local government can not or will not punish, or by methods and devices calculated to abridge the right, then not only does the power vest in Congress but that body is under solemn obligation to inquire into the subject and to enforce a remedy.

Mr. Madison, treating of this question (in No. XLIII of the Federalist) when the reach, powers, and duties of the National Government were not so large as now and its relations with the citizen were less direct, seemed to have contemplated a case precisely like the one under consideration. He says:

> Is it true that force and right are necessarily on the same side in a republican government? May not the minor party possess such a superiority of pecuniary resources, of the military talents and experience, * * * as will render it superior also in an appeal to the sword? * * * Nothing can be more chimerical than to imagine that in a trial of actual force victory may be calculated by the rules which prevail in a census of the inhabitants or which determine the report of an election. * * * In cases where it may be doubted on which side justice lies, what better umpire could be desired by two violent factions, flying to arms and tearing a state to pieces, than the representatives of confederate states not heated by the local flame? To the impartiality of judges they would unite the affection of friends. Happy would it be if such a remedy for its infirmities could be enjoyed by all free governments, if a project equally effectual could be established for the universal peace of mankind.

These passages show that the power in question was given to Congress in an enlarged and patriotic view, and that the framers of the Constitution contemplated its exercise in a case like that to which the resolution is directed.

Mr. President, in the year 1869 Virginia resumed her place in the Union with a State constitution, adopted almost unanimously—but 9,000 votes against it—which embodied the following declarations:

> That this State shall ever remain a member of the United States of America, and that the people thereof are part of the American nation, and that all attempts, from whatever source or upon whatever pretext, to dissolve said Union or to sever said nation are unauthorized and ought to be resisted with the whole power of the State.
> That the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof constitute the supreme law of the land, to which paramount allegiance and obedience are due from every citizen, anything in the constitution, ordinances, or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Thus she took her place in the Union without (as in 1789) any express reservation of power or mental reservation of doctrines such as were known in the political controversies of a past era. She came with heart in hand, surrendering her all and pledging her all for the national peace and prosperity. She gave up powers which had brought ruin and desolation to her people and came to share the fate of the Union as a nation, regarding no special destiny as worth preserving out of the Union or in antagonism with it.

It is to vindicate her good faith in these declarations and in this act that I desire this investigation. It is to remove by such formal instrumentality any doubt which may linger in a respected public judgment that the uncondoned practices and crimes which a political leadership has inaugurated upon her soil are not of the sentiment of a majority of her people, who protest against any desire to nullify any law of the Union.

It is in the hope that such consideration may be brought to the subject as will lead to the arrest of such practices, which militate against the peace and welfare of the people, and in their tendency and direction conspire to a war upon the very integrity of the Constitution.

Virginia, Mr. President, has no cause of hostility against the colored people who in large part compose her population. They are no more responsible for their freedom than for their presence there. They were invested with the rights of citizenship by the grace of the nation, and have worn the immunities with remarkable propriety of conduct. They are as essential to her fields of industry as the machinery of New England is to her manufactories. They are a factor in her life for which no other can be substituted, and between the races as between classes there is a community of interests on which is dependent the happiness and welfare of all—the march of intellectual and material progress—that wisdom and humanity ought to conserve.

'Tis liberty alone which gives the flower
Of fleeting life its luster and perfume,
And we are weeds without it.

It conspires to enlighten human action.

Bondage, personal or political, is the natural implement of usurpation, a serious and fearful evil in every free community. Nothing more degrades the man than living among freemen himself a slave. "Even the very earth, which teems profusion under the cultivating hand of free labor, shrinks into barrenness from the contaminating sweat of the slave;" and who is not a slave, measurably, whose liberty by any means is restrained in contravention of the rights guaranteed to all?

I rejoice that personal slavery is no longer legalized in our own fair Eden of liberty, and that all men are liberated to an even chance in the race of life to which God and nature have given them the title. In Virginia the colored people ask no more, and the white man there who envies him this privilege and apprehends his supremacy reproaches the intelligence and manhood of his own race.

To discover the gross violations of these principles which have been committed in Virginia during the late political campaign and to find and apply the remedy I take to be the object of the proposed investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). Will the Senator suspend? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. MAHONE. I shall have done in a very few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall finish this matter. I propose when the Senator is through to submit a motion to that effect.

Several SENATORS (to Mr. MAHONE). Go on! Go on!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. MAHONE. I have no fear that the State will suffer by the inquiry. On the contrary, I am confident she will emerge from it free from all stain upon the reputation of the majority of her people, while upon a violent faction will be found the responsibility and the blood of her murdered citizens.

Here, in this Capitol, where the breath of freedom has ever inspired devotion to the God-given rights of men, here in a government which is founded on the ever-molding basis of equal rights, is the place to set on foot investigation of such flagrant acts of moral turpitude and of crime in contravention of the Constitution and laws of the Union and to reach out for the remedy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the general orders be postponed with a view to continuing the debate and taking a vote on this resolution. I hope indeed to get a vote, if possible, before adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of the resolution at this time? The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the resolution.

Mr. VANCE. Not upon the preamble?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not upon the preamble, but upon the resolution.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). On this question and all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] requested me yesterday evening to pair with him on political questions. I reckon this would be considered one, and he would probably vote "yea," would he not [addressing the Republican side of the Chamber]?

Several SENATORS. We think so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should vote "nay" if I felt at liberty to do so.

Mr. JACKSON (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). Some time last week the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] said he intended to be absent a portion of this week, and desired me to pair with him. Unless he be paired with some one else or is present, I shall refrain from voting. I am in favor of the resolution, and should vote for it if I were at liberty to do so.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of California (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FARLEY]. If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], who, if here, would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] announced his pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Nebraska can vote. I know the Senator is generally paired with my colleague, but the Senator from New Hampshire, I understand, makes this pair with my colleague.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PUGH (after having voted in the negative). I have just been reminded of the pair I had with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on all political questions. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Mahone,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,

So the resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am, paired as before stated, with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]. Were he present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 29; as follows:

So the preamble was agreed to.

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE MACKEY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolution from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the funeral ceremonies of the late EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative in this body from the State of South Carolina, be held in this Hall on Wednesday, January 30, at 1 o'clock p. m.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate and invite the Senate to attend the said funeral ceremonies.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives, the Senate will attend the funeral ceremonies of Hon. EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a member of the House of Representatives, in the Hall of the House, on Wednesday, January 30, at 1 o'clock p. m.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 844) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Fort Worth, Tex.

DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. BAYARD. I rise to call for the special order made for to-day at 2 o'clock and which was passed by informally.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to me until I can have passed two small appropriation bills that ought to be passed to-day. I think they will take but a few moments of time.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be done without displacing the regular order.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. With the understanding that the special order is not displaced but only temporarily laid aside to let the appropriation bills be passed, I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order undisposed of is before the Senate, pending which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution reported by him yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. House joint resolution 121.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations instruct me to move an amendment. It is in line 3, to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" and in line 8, after the word "Territory," to insert:

And out of this appropriation the sum of not exceeding $5,000 may be expended for telegraphing and making purchases of such supplies, including cost of advertising.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available, to be applied to the support and maintenance of the Indians at Crow agency, at Fort Belknap, Fort Peck, and Blackfeet agencies, in Montana Territory; and out of this appropriation the sum of not exceeding $5,000 may be expended for telegraphing and making purchases of such supplies, including cost of advertising.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, the title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution appropriating $100,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians."

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask the Senate to take up the House bill No. 3948.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment was to insert, after line 12:

For the purpose of reimbursing to the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the sum of $8,137.62, expended by said bureau in payment of persons employed in the Bureau of Internal Revenue in and about the work of counting, canceling, and redeeming internal-revenue checks and proprietary stamps during the months of July, August, September, October, and November, 1883, and for the payment of such persons as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall necessarily employ in his office in and about the work of counting, canceling, and redeeming internal-revenue checks and proprietary stamps, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 35:

Provided, That the legislative proceedings, records, and laws of said Territory shall be printed in the English language.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. BAYARD. I call for the special order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. For the purpose of settling the practice under the new rules, I desire to raise a question in regard to the alleged special order. The bill to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories was, by a vote of the Senate, made the special order for yesterday at 2 o'clock. It was not reached or taken up at that time, and I think under the old rules there would be no doubt whatever that it would fall and would not be the special order to-day. Now, whether this is changed by Rule X of the present rules or not is the question that I desire to submit to the Chair. I myself am of the opinion, and so stated when in the chair a few minutes ago, that the Calendar of General Orders was in order at 2 o'clock; that the special order made for yesterday not having been taken up or laid before the Senate fell at that time, and is not to-day the special order.

Mr. BAYARD. I would refer the Chair respectfully to Rule X, relating to special orders. The construction of any rule or law is that no man shall be driven to an impossibility. Yesterday the hour of 2 o'clock had not arrived when the Senate adjourned, and therefore it was not within the compass of possibility that the special order could have been called; but by reference to the tenth rule, in relation to special orders, it will be found the presiding officer shall lay it before the Senate unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day, it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders in the order of time at which it was made special. So that, there being no other special order on the Calendar of Special Orders, this bill would stand there by the force of Rule X.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has considered the question somewhat on previous occasions in regard to the force of this language, and has been in considerable doubt as to the true construction of Rule X. The Chair came to the conclusion with considerable hesitation that if a special order were not reached and laid before the Senate at the date for which it was appointed, when any preceding unfinished business should be disposed of and the morning business was gone through and 2 o'clock reached so that otherwise the Calendar of General Orders would be in order, it would be his duty to lay the special order before the Senate. But the question is so doubtful on the language of the rule that the Chair would be glad to take the opinion of the Senate, and he will submit to the Senate the question whether this special order under the circumstances stated is now before the Senate. He will leave it to the decision of the Senate to make a precedent for the future action of the Chair.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to this bill being taken up at this time. The Senate is so thin now that perhaps the question had better be submitted to the Senate at some other time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the point of order be reserved, and let us go on.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may now be proceeded with.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill, I ask that the Senate proceed with bill No. 19.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may now be proceeded with, not admitting that it is the special order at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the effect of unanimous consent, the Chair would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, would seem to imply that the bill is not now before the Senate, and that is the question which the Chair wishes to submit to the Senate. If there is no objection, the Chair will proceed with the special order without prejudice to any future decision of the Senate on the question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; that is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is before the Senate, being the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories. It has been read through in Committee of the Whole and is now open to amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. As a matter of fact, the reading of the bill was suspended on the application I think of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER]. I suppose therefore the reading had better be concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is now informed that the reading of the bill was not entirely concluded. The reading will be resumed at the point where it was suspended on the former occasion.

The Chief Clerk resumed at section 6 and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no desire to delay the consideration of the Senate by a repetition of statements or explanations of this measure. As I have said before upon its preceding consideration, it has been for many years before the Senate. It first was debated and passed in 1879. It was again brought up, debated, and passed by the Senate in 1880. In 1883 it was again unanimously recommended by the committee for passage, and reported by me as the organ of the committee for that purpose, but was prevented from being considered by the pressure of the tariff bill which occupied the whole time of the Senate at the last session.

The object of the bill may be stated in a few words to be the scrupulous, punctilious performance of treaty stipulations between the Government of the United States and Mexico, not simply as a treaty but a treaty under the Constitution which has all the force of any law passed in pursuance of the Constitution. Many claims of the character of those covered by the bill have been subjected to adjudication by the courts of the United States, and various expedients have preceded the introduction of this bill such as the formation of land commissions as in the case of California, the delegation of the power to examine and hear to the surveyors-general of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. All these methods of considering the question and passing upon the rights and interests of citizens of the United States, private claimants to lands within these Territories, having been subjected to experience and criticism, the result is the present measure as being far more potential and far preferable to protect the rights of private owners, great and small, and to restrain the rapacity of the larger owners proceeding under the indefiniteness which marked grants of land by Mexico or under the more ancient Spanish title.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] very naturally desired to inspect a bill of this importance, and I am glad the time was allowed for that purpose, for that Senator intimated an apprehension that the rights of the smaller owners had not been cared for sufficiently. I think an examination of this bill will show to him that the right of trial in the local court, the district court of the United States in the Territory, is given to each and to all, with the right of appeal, of retrial, of obtaining increased and new testimony, even up to and in the Supreme Court of the United States, so that if there has been a failure of justice in any court below, if there has been an emission to take testimony in any court below, if there has been any fraud that could not be well detected in the court below, it is brought here so that it can be examined by lights both before and after the suit and full protection can be given to the United States as well as to the various claimants to this property.

The bill carefully protects the United States against the granting of minerals, none of which passed under the Mexican grant. It protects the United States against the granting of unknown areas of land which the Supreme Court of the United States has declared to be the cause of the greatest confusion and the cause of the greatest injustice and has led to the confirmation of titles to the same land to a number of wholly different litigants. We are intending by this legislation to prevent such confusion, so that when the Supreme Court shall pass upon questions of title they shall have something less vague, less uncertain than the guesswork, the mere sweep of the eye and the direction of the hand that really was the controlling power to a Mexican land grant. The grant can not exceed either in square leagues or otherwise an amount exceeding about fifty thousand acres in round numbers.

I do not know, Mr. President, that there is any explanation necessary for me to give to the Senate as the matter has been before them heretofore; and although I know that there are gentlemen now members of the body who were not present when the bill was formerly discussed, still as they have had the opportunity to examine this bill as it was reported at the last session and has been upon the Calendar since early in December of the present session and has been now brought a week ago before their attention, I do not think it necessary for me to detain the Senate by an explanation in advance of the provisions of this bill. Suffice it to say that lawyers in this body who command the confidence on every ground of the country and of the Senate have matured this measure, that in it they have endeavored to protect the interests of the United States and have endeavored to protect the honest interests of every claimant, and I trust the measure will meet now the approval of the Senate, and will be adopted without substantial amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I had hoped the gentleman in charge of this bill, after the statement which I had made somewhat hurriedly and as I then said without a proper opportunity for examination of the bill, would be at least ready to answer some of the objections which I made in good faith, and which I thought important enough to have the consideration of Senators and to have an explanation from those who had charge of this bill. But I am answered to-day, after a few days of reflection, by the Senator from Delaware, that this bill must be passed by right of prescription, having been passed two or three times heretofore by the Senate, and been favorably considered by a committee at other times and having been printed and on the tables of Senators during this session, that it is hardly open to criticism now, and further that it is the result of deliberation of such learned men in the law that it is presumptuous in any one to question the correctness of any of its provisions. I submit to that reproof with that humility for which I trust I have ever been noted and which I hope I shall continue to follow and to exhibit.

Now, sir, there are some things in this bill, notwithstanding it has passed the Senate three or four times, notwithstanding it has received the consideration of gentlemen whom the world knows are learned in the law, that ought to receive the attention of the Senate, if they are objections to the bill. I characterized some of these provisions in some remarks I made when the bill came up before, as being unjust, oppressive, and I said that I would almost say infamous.

In that expression I referred especially to one of the provisions of this bill which authorizes general scrip to be issued to those who make out a claim where the lands have been granted by the Government for some other purpose or reserved for the use of the Government, allowing the issue of a kind of scrip which has heretofore been used to the oppression and to the absolute ruin of citizens of the United States in my own State and in others, like what is called Porterfield scrip, like what is called Valentine scrip, a kind of scrip conferring such general privileges and so desirable that upon the very passage of a law authorizing that scrip and the issuing of the scrip it would be worth for every acre granted of the scrip from fifteen to twenty dollars per acre as fast as issued. When I come to that provision of the bill, I will call the attention of the Senate to it more particularly.

Now, I ask Senators to examine the provision in the third section of this bill on the sixth line; I ask the Senator reporting the bill to look at the provision in section 3, line 6, which declares—

> That the testimony which has been heretofore lawfully and regularly received by the surveyor-general of the proper Territory or State, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon all claims presented to them, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act when the person testifying is dead, so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent evidence.

By the provisions of an act of Congress passed July 22, 1854, the surveyor-general of New Mexico was authorized to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to land under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and for that purpose the act gave him the power to issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises.

The surveyor-general, under that law, was required to make a full report of all such claims, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States, provided that that report should be laid before Congress for such action thereon as might be deemed just and proper, with a view to confirm bona fide grants and give full effect to the treaty. By an act of July 15, 1870, the same authority, powers, and duties were imposed upon the surveyor-general of Arizona.

Under the provisions of the law passed in 1854 these public officers, authorized by law, with their powers fully defined and the limits of their discretion and of their power fully prescribed, have been proceeding for almost thirty years to examine cases presented to them and to take testimony and to make reports. Claimants of all kinds, of large tracts and of small tracts, have under the law of the United States appeared before the proper authority, and at great expense, with great labor, have assiduously prosecuted their claims, procured the testimony of witnesses, procured authentic copies of all papers relating to their grants both from the Mexican Government and our own. Many of them have exhausted all their pecuniary resources in complying with the law and presenting their claims to the surveyors-general of these different Territories, procuring reports, having them transmitted to the Commissioners of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and having them presented to Congress. They stand here to-day upon our files, the result of the labors and the expenditure of our citizens to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars; and after all this labor, this care, this expenditure in following out a proceeding sanctioned by law, and the only proceeding in which they were authorized by law to engage, after waiting year after year, as many of these cases have done, for the action of Congress, they take this testimony, they take these reports, they have them passed upon by committees with some recommendation to Congress either to pass or reject them, and they are met thirty years after these labors were performed and this expenditure incurred with a new bill which disallows all that they have done, which throws out all the testimony that with so much care and painstaking they had gathered together, except that of witnesses who are dead. If that is not a mockery of justice, if that is not judgment and justice long delayed to claimants who have rights, their own natural rights and the rights guaranteed to them through solemn treaty stipulations, I do not know what the delays and the quibbles of justice are.

These reports of the surveyors-general, with the testimony, with all that is done before them, may be presented to the court provided to renew and carry on the duties of surveyors-general under the old law, but no testimony is to be admitted and be considered by that court unless the witnesses who gave the testimony are dead. I do not wonder that such a bill as this never got further than the Senate. I do not wonder that this bill has passed the Senate of the United States three different times, and yet could never gain a hearing among the Representatives of the immediate wants, and necessities, and rights of the people of the United States. It could not have been spoken to its credit that year after year the Senate had passed it, and it had died in the House as it has. If it is a proper bill; if it does justice to claimants; if it is fair in the eyes of the people; if it has the sanction of law, and of usage, and of custom, the marvel is that the bill should not have passed the other House long ago. That it did not might be taken as some indication that it was a questionable measure, and that, however highly it might have been estimated as mere abstract, cold, philosophical law, the common judgment of men close to the people and their wants, and their rights, failed to approve of the bill. To my mind the reason given for its passage by the Senator from Delaware is a reason why the Senate should call a halt in this matter and reconsider their action, and not press upon the consideration of new Senators and old Senators, and all Senators who have not had time to examine this matter, a measure which has failed to meet year after year the approval of the other branch of Congress.

When the Senator from South Carolina who has the ear of the Senator reporting this bill, to whom I am immediately talking, has concluded I will go on.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was not aware of the fact that he was addressing the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CONGER. I do not much expect, perhaps, a reply to any of these objections, but it would at least be gratifying to me if I could feel some assurance that the Senator reporting this bill had heard them.

Mr. BUTLER. I will listen to the Senator from Michigan with a great deal of pleasure from this time on, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CONGER. Not that it makes any particular difference about what I have to say, but it would be personally gratifying to know that my objections to the bill could be heard by the Senator who has charge of it.

If I understand it aright (and I can be corrected if I am wrong) the unvaried custom of this Government through a long succession of years, and a satisfactory one, from the formation of the Government until the present time, in settling the rights of parties under treaty stipulations to the territories or lands in the ceded portion, has been to appoint a commission to whom should be referred all cases of a class affected by the treaty, who should have the power to hear and receive evidence in regard to all such claims. I do not know that any other provision has ever been made by law except the one provision which made ex officio the surveyor-general of the Territory the commission to inquire. In looking over the history of these commissions I find that all old French claims that originated before the surrender of the Canadian possessions by France to Great Britain and were continued by treaty stipulations in the surrender of portions of Canadian and old French territory to the United States, were settled by commissions. All along our borders adjoining Canada, in New York, in Michigan, in Minnesota, in all places where they were, the old French claims handed down through the occupancy and jurisdiction of the British Government till their surrender to us have been settled by commissions.

In that connection I desire to say that at the proper time I shall present a substitute for this bill providing for a commission, which has heretofore been presented to the Senate, which has substantially had some consideration here on former occasions, and to which I believe the attention of many Senators has been called. I may say that it is in conformity to the custom and usages and practice of this Government from the beginning till now. It perhaps would not be improper to say that it meets the approval of those having more immediate charge of the lands and territories within the United States, and which are the subjects embraced in the bill now before the Senate and in the substitute which I shall present.

I have said that the provision which would throw aside testimony taken before the surveyors-general of these Territories under the authority of law in all cases unless it was shown that the parties giving the testimony were dead is a violation of the rights of all those people who have been acting under law for thirty years, more or less. At the proper time I shall move to strike out, in section 3, line 6, the words "when the person testifying is dead," so that all the testimony, whether of the dead or of the living, if this bill shall pass, may go before the courts having jurisdiction of this matter and may be considered by them in their conclusions.

There is another clause in section 9, lines 16 and 17, which I think can not pass the Senate or any other body with the experience we have had in regard to the kind of scrip authorized by this bill. Section 9 provides that when a claimant has maintained his claim and there shall have been sold or granted by the United States any of the lands embraced within that claim, "scrip for an equal amount of acres so released, in quantities not exceeding six hundred and forty acres each, which scrip shall be assignable in such form as may be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall be receivable, acre for acre, in payment for any public lands in either of said Territories or States, respectively, that may be subject to private entry at the minimum price."

The main objection which I have to this is a provision of the bill which, as I understand it, authorizes the locating this scrip outside of the Territory in which the grant may be found to exist, that kind of scrip which may be laid anywhere and everywhere where there are subject to private entry any lands of the United States. I have said that if that be the provision, if it be like other scrip of that kind which may be laid in any of the Territories or States of the United States, it has worked infinite hardship to citizens, some of whom had expended, after they thought they had obtained a good title to their land, long years of labor in making homes upon it, and suddenly by the operation of law and by the application of this scrip upon such lands were deprived of the benefits of their homes and the title to their land. I think the mere reference to that, if I construe this provision aright, suggested to any mind, would cause that clause to be stricken out, and I shall move in the proper place to strike out the words beginning in line 16 of section 9, and to substitute words therefor, so as to read:

In payment for any public lands in the Territory of New Mexico or the other Territories or States in which said lands and claims may have been situated.

There is only one other clause to which I wish to call attention in this bill with which I have at present any concern, and to that I only call the attention of those who may be interested. Section 13 provides—

That section 8 of the act of Congress approved July 22, A. D. 1854, entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyors-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," and all acts amendatory or in extension thereof or supplementary thereto, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

With that I have nothing to do except to inquire of those who reported the bill whether that would remove surveyors-general of those States or Territories or throw into any confusion the rights of parties who may have filed in those surveyors-general's offices their claims to any of the lands of the United States.

In furtherance of what I have said I desire to offer as a substitute to the bill a bill to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories. The principal provisions of this substitute are that it provides for a commission, with the proper machinery and apparatus, to hear by one body all these claims, and not, as in the present bill, to have one claim brought in Arizona, another in New Mexico, another in Colorado, and another in Utah, three or four different courts passing upon these several claims without, perhaps, uniformity of practice.

Another feature of the substitute which I like very well is that by virtue of the provisions of the bill the claim shall be established after having been passed upon by the commissioners, after having been reviewed by the courts, but that the final payment for any lands withheld or substitution of other lands shall await the further action of Congress that none of the objectionable scrip to which I have alluded shall be issued. I think it is a more direct and more compact way of settling these claims, easier for the claimants to produce their proof, easier for the Government to meet false claims, than the bill before the Senate.

I send to the President's desk this substitute for the bill now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The substitute is not in order at present. There are certain amendments offered by the committee to the text of the bill, and they are entitled to precedence as perfecting the bill before the substitute will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. If I understand the rule, the rule is especially intended to provide that a bill may be amended after a substitute is offered and before it is voted on. There is no doubt about amendments to the bill being in order before any vote is taken upon the substitute, but not before its presentation, if I know the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to offer his substitute, but no vote can be taken upon it, as the Chair understands, until after votes have been taken upon the amendments touching the text of the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I had already intimated by my statement that I should offer certain amendments to the bill, but I first offered the substitute, and then under the rule to perfect the bill I desired to offer those amendments after the committee amendments had been acted upon.

Mr. BAYARD. Let the amendments of the committee be passed upon. They are purely verbal. I think they will not excite debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims is, in the fourth line of section 1, to strike out the word "corporations" and insert "corporation." It is adopted without objection. The second amendment is, in the ninth line of section 1, to strike out "Mexico" and insert "Mexican." It is adopted without objection. The third amendment is, in section 2, line 42, to insert the words "as aforesaid." It is adopted without objection. The fourth amendment is, in section 11, line 4, to strike out the word "hereinafter" and insert the word "hereinbefore." It is adopted without objection. Those are all the amendments reported by the committee. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware who has the bill in charge if any simpler machinery could be devised by the committee who reported the bill to adjust and perfect these contesting land claims? It seems to me that the machinery is very complicated, is very expensive, that it requires a very long time to reach a result: first, an appeal to the territorial courts; afterward an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, if that be necessary. It involves a long-continued litigation, a great expense, in many cases equal to if not in excess of the absolute value of the land for which the claimants are contending. It will prevent a great number of worthy legal holders of land in these Territories from even attempting to defend their rights.

I also see in the seventh clause of the twelfth section a provision which to my mind is totally at variance with justice and right. After making provision for determining who is the proper and legal owner of the land, the section proceeds in this way:

> Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than eleven square leagues of land to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

Let me state a case to the Senator from Delaware. Suppose, for instance, that Spain originally, as she has done in very many of these cases, issued a grant for lands within the territory of what afterward became Mexico or was Mexico at the time. In the treaty with Mexico, Mexico agreed to guarantee and keep sacred all the rights of property that had been transferred by any title from the Crown of Spain. The Government of the United States in like manner in our treaty with Mexico agreed also to preserve all the rights of property owners in the territory acquired from Mexico. Now, we will suppose that some claimant has title, perfect title—because the title must be good until such time as it is overthrown—to not only eleven square leagues of land, which amount to about 48,000 acres, but he has title to four hundred thousand acres. The tribunal having charge of this case, and jurisdiction and control over it, declare in express terms that, however good the title may be to a greater quantity than eleven square leagues, no confirmation shall be made and no patent issued for a greater quantity. This seems to me like a virtual confiscation of the property over and above eleven square leagues.

I suppose the authority for this proposed legislation is found in a law passed by Mexico subsequent to the time of the case of which I speak. I now speak of titles coming from Spain to Mexico, guaranteed by Mexico by treaty. I know that Mexico has passed some subsequent law restricting a grant to eleven square leagues of land; but why should that be adopted as to Mexican titles? Under this bill it will be necessary for almost every claimant of lands in any of the Territories, particularly those derived from Mexico, to quiet title in the manner prescribed by the bill. The title is quieted and made good as to eleven square leagues of land, but to give a patent simply clouds the title to every acre above that quantity, because the claimant has made this appeal to the court, to the law, to defend his title against all comers and all claimants, and the tribunal declares that he shall not have such title as the bill proposes to give to not more than eleven square leagues.

I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware if it would interfere very materially with his plan if I should move to strike out the entire seventh clause of the twelfth section.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course such an amendment to the bill will be considerably debated. The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] intimated an intention of amending the third section of the bill. He has also intimated an intention of offering either a substitute for the entire bill or for one of the sections in another direction, I did not understand precisely which. Now comes my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and asks me whether it would interfere with any plan of the bill to strike out the clause restricting the area of land confirmed to eleven square leagues.

The question is which of these propositions shall we take up first? If my friend from Michigan will offer his amendment to make all proceedings, all affidavits and depositions, whether the party be dead or alive, testimony in a court of justice, we will meet that; or his other amendment relating to the location of land-scrip will be considered; or the third proposition, that of my friend from New Jersey to strike out the limitation upon the confirmation and the area of land.

Any amendment that is offered I will endeavor to answer, or to show if I can to the Senate why it ought not to be made. Now which comes first? My friend from Michigan first made the objection to the bill, and if he will put his objection in the form of an amendment to be offered to the third section we had probably better discuss and end that, and then proceed to that offered by my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understood the Senator from Michigan to make some suggestions as to a betterment of the bill in different parts as we went along, notably the third section. I then understood the Senator from Michigan not to offer any particular amendment, but that he preferred to offer a substitute for the entire bill which contained all that he wished to accomplish in the shape of legislation upon this subject.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator misunderstood me, if he will allow me. I desired, as I thought I had the right, to offer a substitute first. There was some question about when it could be offered, but I stated to the Chair that when that was offered I myself had three or four amendments which I designed to offer to the bill, and which could be offered after the substitute for the whole bill had been offered, under the rule that we may always perfect a bill before a substitute is voted on. I have no objection to the Senator from New Jersey going on with any amendment he proposes to offer now.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is impossible for us to understand the full import of the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan. It has not been printed and laid before the Senate, and therefore for one I can not judge of the details of his measure; but upon the general principle which he sets forth, to wit, that of a commission to determine this question, I must confess that I am very strongly in favor of the proposition. The machinery is just as perfect, or can be made so in all its workings, it is far less expensive, far more rapid in its results, and far better. But as to the details, the machinery which he employs for the purpose of carrying into effect his measure, that must certainly be a matter of consideration.

Therefore, if the substitute is not to be voted upon at present, and I think it can not be intelligently voted upon now, I will offer an amendment to strike out the seventh clause of the twelfth section entirely and leave the whole question as to ownership, the number of acres, the title to the number of acres, and everything connected with it to the same tribunal without any restriction whatever. Less than that is less than absolute justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to strike out in section 12 from line 45 to line 51, inclusive, being clause 7.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will permit me to say that I sent to the Chair, and there is now on the Secretary's desk, a substitute which I offered for the bill. A little question as to the time when it should properly be offered intervened, but I have just been informed that it was a proper thing to send and have read and presented to the Senate before we proceed to perfect the bill. That was my design in sending it to the Chair, and I ask that it may be read in its proper order of presentation. The question which arose of course is past now, the amendments of the committee having been acted upon.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I suggest to him that I think the object he has in view would be better accomplished by leaving a portion of the seventh clause in the bill. If he will simply let it read, "No confirmation shall be in any case made for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim;" that would amount simply to an admonition to the court to specially observe the question of the right of the executive officer making the grant to confer upon the grantee the particular land specified in the grant. Certainly we are not required to do anything more for these people than they would have been entitled to under the law of Mexico or Spain.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I submit to the Senator from Kansas that this is a very peculiar bill if it admits more than that. I did not suppose that such a repetition was necessary. In other words, it would be equivalent to saying that no greater quantity of land shall be awarded to any one individual than he owns.

Mr. PLUMB. This might arise: there may have been grants for larger amounts than under the law the executive officer had the right to grant; so I think in that respect there ought to be some portion of the clause reserved.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have no objection to the modification.

Mr. VEST. The clause of the bill which the Senator from New Jersey moves to strike out is, I think, beyond any question in direct violation of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, made in 1848 between the United States and Mexico. I can not conceive that any legislation can be framed more directly in violation of the provisions of that treaty than the clause of the bill now before the Senate. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in its whole scope and intent upon the part of Mexico was, and of both contracting parties, intended to preserve the rights of Mexican citizens as to lands or other property held by them under grants from Mexico or under Spanish grants at the time the treaty was made. I quote now from a clause of that treaty. Article 8 reads:

> Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.
> Those who shall prefer to remain in the said territories may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said territories after the expiration of that year without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

In the said territories property of every kind now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

In article 9 the treaty says:

The Mexicans who in the territories aforesaid shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution, and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

Now, I submit that these clauses show beyond a scintilla of doubt or criticism that the intention of the Mexican Republic and of the contracting parties was that all property and all property rights and all title held by Mexicans who were then living upon this ceded territory, the results of the defeat of Mexico in the Mexican war, should be protected in the hands of the holders, whether the grants came from old Spain or from Mexico after it became a republic. The Senator from New Jersey has said that some of these claims came originally from as far back as the time of Ferdinand and Isabella. The Spanish Government, a government which has exceeded all others in spoliations by force of arms, paid its soldiers and its adventurers by giving immense grants of land, principally for mineral acquisition, and, as the Senator justly remarked, these grants were transferred for value received before the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to innocent parties. Grants were made by Spain. This provision now before the Senate absolutely nullifies all those grants and sweeps away in one single clause all the vested rights which were thus acquired.

What is the excuse for this, Mr. President? It is what is called the colonization act of Mexico, passed in 1824. The object of that act has been entirely misconceived, in my judgment, by the committee that reported this bill, and that can be readily tested by reference to the act itself.

The colonization act of Mexico was intended to put upon these vast areas of land in New Mexico foreigners. The only provision in the act of 1824 passed by the General Congress of Mexico which applies to its own citizens was that upon any territory within twenty leagues of a foreign country or ten leagues of the seacoast none but Mexicans should be allowed to settle. They were afraid of the incursion of foreign powers; they were afraid then of a war with the Government of the United States, which subsequently occurred; and they put in this clause in the act of 1824 that within twenty miles of the boundaries of Mexico from any foreign country or ten miles of the seacoast only citizens of Mexico should be permitted to settle; but as to the other colonization for New Mexico, Chihuahua, and all the territories we acquired by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, except within twenty miles of the frontier, it was left open to the settlement of foreigners. The act of 1824 was called the "colonization act" and intended for the purpose of bringing foreigners into the country.

Let us look at the act of 1824. Section 1 of the decree of the Mexican Congress of August 10, 1824, respecting colonization, is in these words:

The Mexican nation promises—

To whom now?—

to those foreigners—

Mark the language—

to those foreigners who may come to establish themselves in its territory security in their person and property, provided they subject themselves to the laws of the country.

The second section says:

The objects of this law are those national lands which are neither private property nor belong to any corporation or pueblo, and can therefore be colonized.

Surely, Mr. President, ex vi termini the Congress of Mexico never could have talked about colonization by Mexicans. Would any Senator on this floor believe that an act of our Congress which proposed colonization upon its own domain meant colonization from the people or citizens of the United States? Surely no one would contend that. Colonization meant the colonization of foreigners. It meant to encourage immigration into Mexico in order that lands might be taken up and be rendered subject to the skill of the agriculturist. Section 4 of this act says:

Those territories comprised within twenty leagues of the boundaries of any foreign nations or within ten leagues of the seacoast can not be colonized without the previous approval of the supreme general executive power.

In other words, that applied to the territory adjacent to foreign nations and on the seacoast where there was danger of invasion. Then the act of Congress said the government itself must approve of the grants before any title should pass. In another section they provide that Mexicans shall have the preference in regard to the lands last named intended for military purposes, and intended to keep the title of these lands within the reach of their own citizens. The act of 1824 never meant that all citizens of Mexico holding under Spanish grants or otherwise should not receive after that time more than eleven square leagues of land.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] asks me, in support of my position, to refer to article 58:

That to no new settler—

Says the act of 1834—"creador" is the Mexican term—

That to no new settler more than four square leagues shall be granted or sold, unless it can be shown that on account of the abundance of stock owned by such new settler he needs more; in which case the treasurer-general will concede him only so much as he may need as shown by the testimony of impartial witnesses.

Mr. BAYARD. What does the Senator quote from?

Mr. VEST. I read from a "Compilation of the laws, regulations, usages, and conditions of Spain and Mexico under which lands were granted and held, and missions, presidios, and pueblos established and governed," by John Wasson, United States surveyor-general for Arizona.

Mr. BAYARD. I have in my hand the Mexican law.

Mr. VEST. I am reading from the act of July 11, 1834, "Ley Organic de Hacienda" (Organic Law of the Treasury). Article 57 of this law provides:

That any one having necessity for a tract of land for grazing or other purposes shall present himself before the treasurer-general.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator give me the date of that law?

Mr. VEST. The 11th of July, 1834, but I was referring especially to the act of 1824, which was the basis of this legislation.

Again, if there be anything in legislative construction or in any sort of construction on the part of a government, I assert here that the Government of Mexico has never carried out any such provision as this committee say must be in existence in order to support the provision which the Senator from New Jersey is struggling against. I deny that Mexico ever annulled any grant of over eleven square leagues since 1824, for they paid no attention to it; and I say more than that, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided absolutely, if I can understand its language, that the Mexican law of 1824 substantially could not affect the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which is the supreme law of this land under the Constitution. In the case of Higueras vs. The United States (5 Wallace, 827) the Supreme Court says:

That when the grant is made by specific boundaries, the grantee is entitled to the entire tract described.

Suppose Spain had granted to one of her own citizens so many thousand leagues of land in Mexico, and described it by mountains and rivers and marked boundaries, the Supreme Court holds that description must govern, notwithstanding any act of the Mexican Congress, and this Government under the treaty of 1848 will respect that grant by confirming the claim according to its boundaries, and carry out the intention of the treaty.

In the case of the United States vs. Sutherland (19 Howard, pages 363–365) the court says:

Since the country (California) has become part of the United States, these extensive rancho grants, which then had little value, have now become very large and very valuable estates. They have been denounced as enormous monopolies, princedoms, &c., and this court has been urged to deny to the grantees what it is assumed the former government had too liberally and lavishly granted. This rhetoric might have a just influence when urged to those who have a right to give or refuse. But the United States have bound themselves by a treaty to acknowledge and protect all bona fide titles granted by the previous government, and this court has no discretion to enlarge or curtail such grants to suit our own sense of propriety, or defeat just claims, however extensive, by stringent technical rules of construction to which they were not originally subjected.

In the United States vs. Moreno (3 Wallace, pages 478, 491) the Supreme Court held that—

The cession of California to the United States did not impair the rights of private property; these rights are held sacred by the laws of nations, and protected by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

In the case of the United States vs. Peralta et al. (19 Howard, page 347) the court says:

We have frequently decided that the public acts of public officers, purporting to be exercised in an official capacity and by public authority, shall not be presumed to be usurped, but that a legitimate authority has been previously given or subsequently ratified.

The whole scope and intent of these decisions, the whole meaning of the Congress of Mexico since the passage of the act of 1824, is to the effect, and only to the effect, that every Mexican citizen holding at the time of the making of the treaty a claim, without regard to its extent, shall be protected in it.

Sir, what right has the Congress of the United States to sit here as a land court and to determine the extent and scope of an act of the Mexican Congress? The decision of the judicial tribunal which it is proposed to establish by this bill is invoked, and yet the bill prejudges the case and says we will not permit the act of the Mexican Congress to be decided by that court, but we will decide ourselves in advance that no Mexican under any Spanish grant, and no other claimant, shall have more than eleven square leagues of land, no matter what may be the boundaries of his grant, no matter though he may hold a patent under the sign-royal of the King of Spain himself prior to 1824. We shut off all beyond eleven leagues. Our act is conclusive. It is robbery in my judgment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to change the language of my amendment to meet the views of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I see no particular objection to it, though really I do not know that there is any very good reason for it. I have given the Secretary the proposed amendment in order that it may be laid properly before the Senate. The amendment is to so change the seventh clause of section 12 as to read as follows:

No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity of land than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws the amendment originally offered, and in its place offers what will now be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "quantity," in line 46 of section 12, it is proposed to strike out "than eleven square leagues," and after the word "land," in line 47, to strike out down to and including the word "quantity," in line 49, as follows: "to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity;" so that the whole clause will read:

No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity of land than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, no greater question can arise in Congress than the maintenance of national faith. The lands we are now considering were ceded to the jurisdiction of the United States by the Republic of Mexico in 1848 partly by the treaty known as that of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and in 1854 another portion by what was known as the Gadsden treaty, or better known as the Gadsden purchase. The eighth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo provided that—

In the said Territories, property of every kind, now belonging to Mexicans not established there, shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

And in the ninth article:

The Mexicans who, in the Territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the mean time, shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

The fifth article of the Gadsden treaty recited that—

All the provisions of the eighth and ninth sixteenth and seventeenth articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, shall apply to the territory ceded by the Mexican Republic in the first article of the present treaty, and to all the rights of persons and property, both civil and ecclesiastical, within the same, as fully and effectually as if the said articles were herein again recited and set forth.

So that the same guarantees apply to the territory ceded under either treaty.

In the first place I may ask what are our duties as a nation under this treaty, and next what is the proposition of the present bill? Let us see first what classes of claims are those to be settled by this bill. They are only cases where the title is incomplete, where the case arises referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] where a man was in possession of one league or of ten thousand leagues, if such a possession were possible, no matter what was the area of his possession, if he was found entitled and in possession at the time of the cession he held under the law of the land, and was protected as any American citizen would be in his legal and constitutional rights of property. He needed no further legislation because this treaty was not simply a convention, a contract between this Government and a foreign government, but it became under our Constitution the supreme law of the land, and every judge of every court of the United States and of every State was bound to construe it as a paramount authority equal to an act of Congress in support of the rights of any party claiming under it. We do not propose by this bill to deal with, or touch or disturb the complete title of any man in any portion of any of these States or Territories. There is no such thing as confiscation of private property under its provisions; there is no such thing as a default in any public obligation. It is simply a legal provision that wherever a man had rights under Spanish or Mexican law and so held them, he could plead them in the courts of the United States; and this bill and the purpose of this bill is surely misunderstood or not comprehended by the Senators from Missouri and New Jersey and by the Senator from Michigan if they imagine that anything else is proposed.

We are not dealing with perfected titles. They need no further action upon the part of the Government, and will be fully recognized by the courts. If the man has his house and ground, his rancho, or any other description of property, it is his, and the treaty protects him in its possession and enjoyment with all the force of any affirming law.

But what is the just claim upon the Congress of the United States? It is that they shall perform the uncompleted obligations of the government from whom the territory was derived, and the duty upon the United States Government is only this, and the present bill only intends this, that we should do those things which the Government of Mexico would have been obliged to do in law and in conscience had these people and had this property remained under the jurisdiction of her laws. That is all that this bill provides; that is all it pretends to do. It takes from no man his completed title. It simply gives to those who have an incomplete title under the laws of Mexico the opportunity to go into a proper tribunal (as to the propriety of that tribunal I shall presently speak) and perfect his claim and obtain his title there according to law and evidence as administered in the courts of the United States.

Look at page 4, section 2, and at line 12 and you will see what decree the courts are to enter in cases proceeding under this bill.

And by a final decree to settle and determine the question of the validity of the title and the boundaries of the grant or claim presented for adjudication, according to the law of nations, the stipulations of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d day of February, A. D., 1848, or the treaty concluded between the same powers at the city of Mexico on the 30th day of December, A. D., 1853, and the laws and ordinances of the Government, questions properly arising between the claimants or other parties in the case and the United States, which decree shall in all cases refer to the treaty, law, or ordinance under which such claim is confirmed or rejected.

There you have as plainly as the English language can give it, and in the fullest terms, the character of the property to be passed upon, and the rule that shall decide it. Is there any default there? Is there any delinquency under the treaties with Mexico or either of them? On the contrary the courts are to enforce the full measure of duty of that government, and only where the title is incomplete, because, Senators, if the title be complete and perfect the owners want nothing further from the United States. They can come into court to enforce their rights as effectually as any other owners in relation to any other land in any other part of the Union. The laws of Mexico are made, by the treaty, the laws controlling the rights of these private claimants. We are not settling the validity or invalidity of an act; we are simply providing for cases where they come to the Government of the United States, and say, "You have assumed to stand in the shoes of the Republic of Mexico, now perform this guarantee that that government was bound to perform."

That, Senators, is the measure of the duties of the Government of the United States under these treaties. There it begins and there it ends. They are to have so much and no more, and that I submit is an entire answer to the charge of attempted confiscation or the trial of a title already perfect which is expressly excluded from this bill. We are not trying such. The language of the act carefully drawn will be found at page 1 of the bill and on line 10:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons or corporation, or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the Republic of Mexico, and now embraced within the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or Colorado, by virtue of such lawful incomplete Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey as the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States which, at the date of the passage of this act, have not been confirmed by act of Congress, or otherwise finally decided upon by lawful authority, and which have not become complete and perfect.

I beg Senators to remember therefore what is the scope and purview of this act. It is only for those titles that are incomplete and where there is a duty imposed by treaty stipulation upon the United States. We are now seeking to perform that, but not to touch the question of perfected titles or interfere with possession where it has been lawfully assured under the laws of Mexico.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask the Senator what in his mind constitutes the difference between what he calls a completed title under a Mexican or Spanish grant, and one incomplete?

Mr. BAYARD. I think it would be impossible to summarize all the cases in which there may be incompleteness of title under the Mexican laws——

Mr. HARRISON. No; the point I make is this: Suppose a case where a party is holding under a Mexican grant described by certain natural boundaries. There has been no action by Congress, no decree by a court establishing that title. If you ask the man for his title he says, "I find it in the Mexican grant," of which we have no record in this country. Would not that be an incomplete grant within the meaning of this bill, and would not such a person under this bill have to go into the court to have that title established?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir—and I imagine that wherever there was an inchoate title, wherever the party had commenced a performance of those things which were to eventuate in a complete title, and had not an opportunity to perfect it under the Mexican law, this bill would enable him to come to the United States, addressing the United States instead of Mexico, to obtain his title, and the court would be obliged to give him a decree which would fully answer all that Mexico could have given him had he completed the requirements and conditions under her laws. That is what I understand to be the object and effect of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Then might there not be cases where a really perfect grant would be provided for in the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. I want to come to that presently; I shall have to go back a little; but the Senator will allow me to go on and answer the question he has already put to me. I am glad the Senator from Indiana has repeated it and I will endeavor to answer it.

In the first place I should like to refer here to the report of the land commission of 1880. I will give the reference, as it was a commission of ability specially constituted for the consideration of the condition and laws relating to the whole public domain of the United States. The report is Executive Document 47, part 4, of the Forty-sixth Congress, third session. I read first the composition of the commission: President, James A. Williamson, Commissioner of the General Land Office; Clarence King, United States geologist; Alexander T. Britton; John W. Powell; James Donaldson; secretary, Clarence E. Dutton, captain ordnance, United States Army. A preliminary report was published in February, 1880, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1879, in which a very valuable and interesting history of the public domain of the United States and of the private land claims which we are now considering will be found. I read from page 406 an extract from the report to the Secretary of the Interior.

After a lapse of nearly thirty years more than one thousand claims have been filed with the surveyors-general, of which less than one hundred and fifty have been reported to Congress, and of the number so reported Congress has finally acted upon only seventy-one. The construction of railroads through New Mexico and Arizona, and the consequent influx of population in those Territories, render it imperatively necessary that these claims should be finally settled with the least possible delay. I have therefore the honor to recommend that the attention of Congress be called especially to this subject, with a view to securing action upon the claims pending before it, and upon the pending bill providing for the settlement of the remaining claims. (Hon. Secretary of the Interior, report 1880.)

I may say that bill is the bill now before the Senate amended in the light of the repeated debates three and four years ago and the advice and approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

With no statute of limitation as to the time of filing these claims, with paper titles of grant held by men and women, stored away in old boxes or carried about their persons, no one can form any estimate of the area yet claimed in New Mexico or Arizona. The surveyors-general and commissioners of the General Land Office for years past have called upon Congress for the enactment of a statute of limitation as to the time of filing these private land claims. There may yet be 1,000 or 5,000. As time moves along the best evidence is fast passing away, which will necessitate more energy and expense on the part of the United States to head off the prospective modern manufacture of ancient muniments of title. There have been patents issued by the United States for 4,456,158.43 acres of private land claims in New Mexico and Colorado; the largest grant being for 1,714,764.94 acres, and the smallest for 1,720 acres.

There were, on the 30th of June, 1880, forty-six claims for private land grants in New Mexico and Colorado, containing an area of 4,675,173.57 acres, pending in the General Land Office for patents, as follows:

* * * * * * *

June 30, 1880, there were sixty private land claims in Colorado and New Mexico pending in Congress for confirmation, embracing an area, so far as the same have been surveyed, of 4,294,672.473 acres. The largest contains 472,736.90 acres, and the smallest 1,003.55 acres.

I cite this to show the condition of these land claims at the end of thirty years, and to submit to the Senate the absolute necessity of doing two things that this bill provides: first, having a settlement so that what is public land may be known and may be made subject to sale and also to private entry; and what is private land may be segregated and held by the owners, that these Territories shall not be paralyzed in their progress to civilization and the development retarded by reason of this uncertainty as to boundaries. It is our duty, therefore, to take such steps as practically shall make the property of each man, be it much or little capable, of ascertainment, of definition, and of being segregated for his use.

The next is as to the statute of limitations. Why it has been, that for thirty years a statute so necessary to the repose of every community should have been delayed, I know not; but it has been so, and at last by this bill a statute of limitations has been proposed, and three years after the passage of this act shall be the limit within which claims to complete the titles of private claimants under the Mexican grants shall be allowed, and after that the bar of limitation shall be interposed that there may be an end to litigation and a repose to titles. Now we come to the question of the restriction of the quantity of land which could be obtained under Mexican grants.

Mr. GARLAND. It is evident we can not progress much further with the bill this evening, and the question the Senator is now approaching is a very important one, and if it will suit him that we go into executive session a while, I will make that motion, and he can go on to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish first to offer an amendment that it may be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer an amendment to come in as an additional section at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment which he asks may be printed. That order will be made.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have the bill which I offered as a substitute for this bill printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that his substitute be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. I desire that it shall be considered as offered and pending before the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I wish to offer an amendment to this bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is to come in at the end of section 11.

HELL GATE, EAST RIVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the necessity of an immediate appropriation of not less than $42,000 to enable the engineer in charge to make next autumn the explosion required for the removal of Flood Rock, in the East River, New York. The importance of the work is well known, and as it appears that without a speedy appropriation a delay of a year must follow, accompanied by large expenses to protect from injury the work already done, I commend the subject to the early and favorable consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 28, 1884.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GARLAND. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES OF HON. E. W. M. MACKEY.

Mr. PETTIBONE submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the funeral ceremonies of the late EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative of this body from the State of South Carolina, be held in this Hall on Wednesday, January 30, at 1 o'clock p. m.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate, and invite the Senate to attend the said funeral ceremonies.

UNION AND CONFEDERATE NAVAL RECORDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to the resolution of the House adopted on the 17th instant, concerning the publication of the Union and confederate naval records of the war of the rebellion.

Mr. COX, of New York. This communication should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, without having read the accompanying papers, supposed that an appropriation would be necessary to provide for the publication of these records. It may go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and if it be discovered that an appropriation is required it can be reported back.

Mr. COX, of New York. The resolution of inquiry to which this is an answer came from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COMMISSIONED ARMY OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a reply to the resolution of the House asking the average number of commissioned officers in the Army of the United States from March 4, 1857, to March 4, 1861, and from March 4, 1877, to March 4, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ELECTION CONTEST—WOOD VS. PETERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House depositions in the contested-election case of Wood vs. Peters, from the State of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. In consequence of a sad event, of which we are all aware, the opportunity was not presented yesterday for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference. I therefore ask, in accordance with the wish of many members—and I suppose there will be no objection to the request—that there be to-day, by unanimous consent, a call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions as on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks unanimous consent that the States and Territories be called to-day for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions under the rules applicable to Monday, the opportunity for this business not having been afforded yesterday.

Mr. COX, of New York. I suppose that includes the ordinary proceedings of Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. Not the entire business of Monday.

The SPEAKER. But, as the Chair understands, the ordinary proceeding under the rule with regard to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. COX, of New York. That will admit resolutions of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request; and it is ordered accordingly.

MESSENGER FOR CHIEF CLERK'S OFFICE.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to submit a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution of Mr. BLAND—

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to appoint a boy as messenger in the office of the Chief Clerk of the House, at a salary not to exceed $25 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise ordered"— respectfully report that they have carefully considered the same, and considering the employment of this boy as a necessity for the proper transaction of business, recommend the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the resolution reported by the committee be again read.

The Clerk again read the report.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of this resolution. As the House is aware, the several offices for the transaction of the business of the Clerk of the House are now separated, and at a considerable distance from each other; so that there is constant necessity for the sending of a messenger from one office to another. This duty has heretofore been discharged by a messenger at a salary of $100 a month. The resolution which we now report calls for the employment of a boy at a salary of $25 a month; and this is necessary for the proper execution of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can the gentleman tell us how many persons are now employed in connection with the office of the Clerk of the House?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I can not. But I know that the transaction of the business of that office requires the employment of a person to travel from one office to another. The different offices are now farther separated than they have ever been; and of course the time of the clerks can not be occupied in running to and fro. The messenger heretofore found necessary for that purpose has been paid $100 a month; and this resolution, therefore, is in the direction of economy, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only objection I have to it is I do not understand, and it has not yet been shown, what necessity there is for this additional employé.

This room of the Clerk of the House is not one in which important business is done. It is the newspaper office, where the newspapers are gathered for the convenience of the members. I must confess I am not able to see any necessity for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I understand an application is to be made by the Clerk that will bring him into closer connection with the various offices of the Clerk's department. It has been regarded as important they should be permitted to get the room which quite recently has been assigned to the Clerk as a private office. My information is the adoption of that resolution, if it should not absolutely do away, would in any event lead to doing away, with the necessity for this messenger, and it is for that reason I make the motion that for the present the pending resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I hope no such motion as that will be adopted. While it may be true there is but little business of a clerical nature transacted in the office of Chief Clerk, every gentleman understands the necessity there is for constant communication with the Clerk of the House and with the enrolling clerks, and with the disbursing clerk, who is in the basement of the building. The Committee on Accounts have instructed me to make this report because they were satisfied this should be granted. The Clerk at the present has in his employment a boy he is paying out of his own pocket.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. From explanation made to me privately I withdraw my motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 25.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that that body had agreed to the resolution of the House for the appointment of a select joint committee to take order for superintending the funeral of EDMUND W. M. MACKEY, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina, and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial, and had appointed as such committee on its part Mr. BUTLER, Mr. PENDLETON, and Mr. HILL.

ADDITIONAL CLERK CLAIMS COMMITTEE.

Mr. BREWER submitted the following privileged report:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"That the Committee on Claims be authorized during this session only, until the further order of the House, to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate of compensation now paid to session committee clerks respectively"— report they have carefully considered the same, and ask it be now passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is a report accompanying this resolution, I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. It has been read, but there was so much confusion it could not be heard by the gentleman.

The report was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to see a disposition to increase the number of employés of the House by simple resolution, and authorize the payment of their compensation out of the contingent fund of the House. I think that practice always leads to the employment of an unnecessary number of employés.

The Committee on Claims is a very important committee, but at a period when its duties were the largest, before the formation of the War Claims Committee, covering the entire period of the war and years afterward, down, I believe, to 1873, when it had before it more business than is now before the two committees, a single clerk was all that was deemed necessary. The Committee on War Claims has now two clerks. The business requires but one competent person. The business of the Committee on Claims can not be increasing. On the contrary, the last Congress showed a great decline in the measures requiring consideration. I think all gentlemen must regret to see a tendency to increase from year to year the number of our employés. If, however, the Committee on Claims insist they can not get along with their business without an additional clerk, of course it will have to be granted; but unless some imperative necessity is shown for the employment of this additional clerk I hope it will not be done.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, by instructions of the Committee on Claims I introduced the resolution which has just been read. I have been here with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] long enough, I think, to convince him that I would be one of the last who would improperly increase the offices of this House or of this Government without sufficient cause. But there are certain duties that it is essential for those of us who compose the Committee on Claims to perform. One of these duties is the proper consideration of bills that have been referred to us for our consideration by the House. We have before that committee to-day a docket, in addition to those bills that have not come up from the Printer and also in addition to those that have not been sent down to us which have come from the Printer, of 507 bills for our consideration. This list involves claims ranging all the way from one hundred to millions of dollars. I will state further that the clerk of that committee, Mr. W. B. Pettie, reached this Capitol soon after the reassembling of Congress after the holidays, and I venture to say that he has never seen this Hall when Congress was in session yet, so closely has he been confined to his duties. Further, I state that there have been only two nights since he came here, Sunday evenings excepted, that he has not come up to this Capitol and worked till 10 or 12 o'clock in the preparation of these bills for the committee and in keeping up the dockets. He is here before 8 o'clock in the morning, and he has done more than we could have reasonably expected from any one man. I know that if the work continues as heavy as it is now he can not do it in the future. His physical strength will not endure it through a session.

Now, if the House wants the committee to act upon the claims which have been referred to it I believe that the adoption of this resolution is essential. If the clerk of the committee did not have to wait upon any members of the House who come there for information as to the status of the measures which they may have introduced for the benefit of their constituents, or who want information as to where claims have been referred, to whom referred, and other references to the files for any other information connected with them, it is possible that the clerical force of the committee as at present constituted would be able to keep up with the work. But I do not believe that can be done if he is called upon to give satisfactory information to members of Congress concerning their claims—such information as they are entitled to and should have. We ought to act upon the claims which are referred to us in some way. If they are just, they should be paid or at least their passage recommended; if they are unjust, they ought not to be permitted to lie there unacted upon and without condemnation in the form of an adverse report.

In order to do justice to the claimants and to Congress we must have some assistance in this matter. If the House is not ready after this statement and in view of the facts which I have suggested to adopt this resolution, they must take the consequences. We can only do our best in the way that we are now going with one clerk, and will, of course, do the utmost that we can. But in the very nature of things these claims can not all be acted upon.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question, if he will permit an inquiry.

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. During the last Congress we passed a bill, which was introduced and promoted by Mr. Bowman, of Massachusetts, whereby it was expected that a great many of these claims would be referred for adjudication as to matters of fact to the Court of Claims. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the Committee on Claims have availed themselves of the provisions of that bill, and if, having availed themselves of its provisions, it will still be necessary for them to have this increase of clerical force?

I ask this because I would like to have his views upon the subject. I am, for one, most desirous of giving the committees all the clerks which may be necessary to aid them in the transaction of public business. But I should like to be informed if that bill under its provisions, if advantage be taken of it by the committee, will not give all the relief that the committee requires?

Mr. McMILLIN. I beg leave to state, in response to the gentleman from Maine, that the committee has availed itself of the provisions of the Bowman bill when claims are reached which in the opinion of the committee ought to be referred to the Court of Claims. I doubt whether the bill is going to give all the relief that was expected by its most sanguine friends. It can, however, be made to give relief to Congress and to the committee if properly guarded.

But it can not give any relief in the direction to which I am now referring. On the contrary, if it has any effect at all it will be to cause an increase of the clerical duties of the committee; because it is the duty of the clerk in the first place, after the claim has been passed upon in committee, to make a minute of the action. Then, if it is referred to the Court of Claims, the duty of making a record of that fact devolves upon him. When it comes back he must note again upon the docket what is done, and in addition note upon the docket what has been the course recommended by the Court of Claims; and the gentleman will see that all of these various obligations must necessarily increase rather than diminish the clerk's duties, while it may diminish the duty devolving upon the committee in the consideration of the claims.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. How many clerks are there now attached to this committee?

Mr. McMILLIN. The committee has now but one. In that connection I may say, and in response also to the gentleman from Indiana, that I have inquired of the old clerk of the committee, Mr. Smith, who sits at the desk now, and have been informed by him that for ten years, both under the Republican and Democratic administrations, this committee has had the assistance provided for in this resolution.

We do not seek an additional annual clerk. We do not seek pay for any time that Congress is not in session. It is with the members of the House to do as they think proper with it, and with their action after this explanation we will be satisfied, whatever that action may be.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BREWER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent of the House, it has been ordered that the call of States and Territories shall proceed to-day as of Monday. The States and Territories will now be called in alphabetical order for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions and resolutions of inquiry for reference, beginning with the State of Alabama.

ABANDONED HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN ALABAMA.

Mr. FORNEY introduced a bill (H. R. 3968) to provide for disposing of lands embraced in abandoned homestead entries in Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS COOSA RIVER.

Mr. FORNEY also introduced a bill (H. R. 3969) to authorize the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama to construct a bridge across the Coosa River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM L. WHITLOCK.

Mr. FORNEY also introduced a bill (H. R. 3970) to refund to William L. Whitlock, of Alabama, taxes illegally collected as income tax; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONFISCATION ACT OF 1862.

Mr. HERBERT (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 3971) for the relief of purchasers under the confiscation act of July 17, 1862, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA DIAGONAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HERBERT also introduced a bill (H. R. 3972) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama and Florida to the Alabama Diagonal Railroad Company and to grant to said company the right to build bridges across certain rivers in said States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ARMS, ETC., FOR NATIONAL GUARDS.

Mr. HERBERT also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 128) authorizing the Secretary of War to exchange Gatling guns or other light field-pieces for the heavy field-pieces now in possession of the National Guard of the several States; also to give said National Guard tents in lieu of arms and ammunition of equal value; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOHN ROGERS.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 3973) for the relief of the heirs of the late John Rogers, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM PREWETT AND OTHERS.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas (by request), also introduced a bill (H. R. 3974) for the relief of William Prewett and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. CROWNOVER AND OTHERS.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3975) for the relief of John T. Crownover and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EZEKIEL RAWLINS.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 3976) to grant a pension to Ezekiel Rawlins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES R. BERRY.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3977) to refund illegal internal-revenue tax collected of James R. Berry, as late auditor of the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE H. PETTIGREW.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 3978) for the relief of George H. Pettigrew; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARY ANNA EGAN.

Mr. BUDD introduced a bill (H. R. 3979) granting an increase of pension to Mary Anna Egan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. BUDD also introduced a bill (H. R. 3980) to amend section 5 of an act approved February 21, 1879, entitled "An act to fix the pay of letter-carriers;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LOUIS FRANCOIS.

Mr. BUDD also introduced a bill (H. R. 3981) for the relief of Louis Francois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EVALINA P. LOW.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (H. R. 3982) for the relief of Evalina P. Low; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE O. DONNELL.

Mr. WAIT introduced a bill (H. R. 3983) for the relief of George O. Donnell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. LORE introduced a bill (H. R. 3984) to provide for the construction of a new public building at Wilmington, Del.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTERFEITING FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Mr. LORE also introduced a bill (H. R. 3985) to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the reference of the bill.

Mr. LORE. I desire that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rules of the House it should go either to the Committee on Banking and Currency or the Committee on the Judiciary. But the Chair will entertain any motion the gentleman may submit in regard to the reference of the bill.

Mr. LORE. I think it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read, so that we may be able to judge of its character.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this bill does not affect the relations between this Government and foreign governments, but it relates to the criminal laws of the United States, and the Chair thinks it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LORE. I will say that it affects our relations with foreign nations simply in this respect: Brazil and some other foreign nations are suffering from this kind of spurious currency which is manufactured in the United States and sent to those countries, and in that way it does affect our relations with foreign nations. The reason that induced me to desire its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs was that that committee has access to and communication with the representatives of foreign nations.

The SPEAKER. Of course, incidentally this bill, if it shall become a law, may affect the interests of foreign nations, just as any legislation may do so. But the main purpose of the bill is to change, and in a very material respect, the criminal law of the United States. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and unless the gentleman submits some motion to refer it to another committee it will take that direction.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MAJ. WILLIAM KENDALL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The Chair is of the opinion this bill should go to the Committee on War Claims. It relates to conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims for the purpose of considering a war claim.

Mr. SINGLETON. It should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not see any objection to that reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House the bill should go to the Committee on War Claims, but the Chair will entertain a motion to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN EATON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. PAYSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that bill should go to the Committee on the Public Lands. It has reference entirely to the disposition of a portion of the public domain.

Mr. HOLMAN. It evidently relates to granting public lands for railroad purposes, and properly belongs to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules this bill should be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and it will be so referred, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. VAN EATON. I move its reference to the Committee on Railways and Canals. It simply provides an appropriation of land to aid in the construction of a railroad.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 77.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the rule imperative that all bills shall be referred to committees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this call under the rule they are introduced for reference only.

Mr. HOLMAN. But is it imperative that this bill shall be referred at all?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule it seems imperative that this bill, which is now introduced for reference, shall be referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. So the Chair holds that when a bill is introduced in this Hall it must go to a committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule it must go to a committee on this call.

This bill will be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. It is very clear that that is where it ought to go?

REMOVAL OF FLOOD ROCK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the necessity of an immediate appropriation of not less than $420,000 to enable the engineer in charge to make next autumn the explosion required for the removal of Flood Rock, in the East River, New York. The importance of the work is well known, and as it appears that without a speedy appropriation a delay of a year must follow, accompanied by large expenses to protect from injury the work already done, I commend the subject to the early and favorable consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 28, 1884.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the message will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I move it be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL H. V. BOYNTON.

Mr. HOPKINS. I submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER, a member of this House, has charged H. V. Boynton, the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, now holding a seat in the press gallery under the rules of the House, with having approached the Speaker of the House during the closing days of the last session of Congress with corrupt propositions intended to influence his official action; and

Whereas this alleged act is in the nature of a gross breach of the privileges of the House, and the charge, if sustained, would call for the exclusion of said H. V. Boynton from the press gallery: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, with power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, to investigate the said charge of attempted corruption, and to report the results of this investigation to the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Is that offered for present consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers it as a privileged resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. Is it offered for present consideration? If so, I make the point of order it is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to say on that point it seems to him to relate to an alleged abuse of the privileges accorded by the House to members of the press.

Mr. CALKINS. That was at the last Congress and not this. It seems to me investigation into abuses alleged against anybody as a member of the last Congress must be by that and not by a subsequent Congress.

Of course I do not deny the right of the House to investigate it; but my opinion is, at first sight, that it should go to a committee, under the rule, before any action can be taken upon it.

I have in my own mind now a precedent which occurred some years ago in the celebrated investigation of the King and Brooks matter, and I recollect that those persons were both able to maintain their seats in a subsequent Congress for offenses which were alleged to have been committed in a prior Congress.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, as I say, these views are expressed upon the instant, and I would like to have the matter go over, at least until it can be examined. For the present this is my hasty opinion.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think my friend from Indiana is somewhat mistaken as to the purport of this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it is permissible I would like to have it read again.

Mr. HOPKINS. It does not affect the privileges of a member of this House or of the last Congress, but it refers to the privileges of a reporter in the gallery of this House, who sits there by consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. And who is now occupying a seat in the gallery.

Mr. CALKINS. But the point I make is that if a member of the last House was corruptly approached by any person, that was clearly an offense committed against the dignity of the last House and not of this. That is the point I am making, and therefore I object to immediate action in this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that if the allegations on which this resolution is based be true, it affects not only the dignity of the House, but the person referred to is unworthy to occupy a seat in the gallery of this House.

Mr. CALKINS. Assuming all that to be true, it does not change the position that I take with reference to the matter. That may be true, or it may be found to be true, rather, after it goes to the committee and they have gone far enough to see whether there is a sufficient basis for it to stand upon.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman is mistaken in assuming that this does more than to authorize the committee to see if there is any basis for it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We do not know what these gentlemen are talking about, Mr. Speaker. I ask that the resolution be again read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. It has been read once, but the Chair will cause it to be reported again, if there be no objection.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CALKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a "corrupt breach of the privileges," I ask, of what House? Not certainly of this one.

I am speaking now simply as to the question of privilege, nothing else; not of the right of a member to introduce such a resolution for reference. But this is alleged to be a question of privilege. Now, I ask the Speaker what right or privilege of this House has been infringed? What prerogative has been invaded? What breach has been committed under the recitation of that resolution of the prerogatives of this House? The last House expired on the 4th day of March last, and nothing presents a question of privilege of this character, as I understand it, unless it relates to the privileges of this House, not to the last House.

So I say that, in my judgment, this can not come in in that way. This, I repeat, is simply my opinion expressed on the moment, my first impression; and I reiterate the assertion that there can be no breach of the privileges of this House by anything that occurred in the last House toward a member of this House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The breach of the privileges, as alleged, of this House can not go to the extent of suspending the rules, creating a new committee, and clothing it with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was about to have read in this connection the rule, No. IX, on this question of privilege, but I will read it myself.

The rule provides as follows:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; and second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of the members individually in their representative capacity only.

This, as I understand it, is not asserted as a question of privilege affecting the members of the House. It is a question of privilege not affecting the last House. It is a question of privilege affecting the present organization of this House, its rights, its safety, its dignity, its integrity, in the making up of the list of those gentlemen who are privileged to sit in yonder gallery. We are entitled to have men of honor and integrity occupying such places; men whom we may trust, and who will not make reckless and absurd charges against members of this House. I believe the object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to bring just that case before the committee. Therefore it is a question of privilege.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to waive the other point either. I believe the rules of the last House by a resolution of this House were extended or adopted by us for a period of twenty days, or until yesterday. To-day we are running without any rules. I say I do not wish to waive that point either.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is called upon to determine whether this is or is not a question of privilege under the rules or under the general parliamentary law. The preamble alleges that a person who is now occupying the gallery of the House by the permission of the House has made an improper proposition to a member, not during the present session, but during the last session. Of course it is well known to the Chair and to every member on the floor that no person can occupy a seat in that gallery without signing a statement or pledge that he is not interested in any legislation pending before the House. It does seem to the Chair that if there is any person occupying a seat in that gallery who has at any time in violation of that pledge made improper proposals to a member of the House, it is not only the right but the duty of the House to investigate the matter, with a view of protecting the integrity of its own proceedings and denying to that person hereafter the privileges of the gallery.

The Chair is therefore disposed to hold, and does hold, that this is a matter of privilege, but would be very glad indeed to have the judgment of the House upon it.

Mr. CALKINS. I say candidly I do not intend to appeal from the decision of the Chair, though I think the Chair wrong, but will bow to its decision.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is on the adoption of the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and

The joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

H. V. BOYNTON.

Mr. KEIFER. I am at liberty at least to infer, from what I have heard and what I know, that this resolution is offered in consequence of a statement that I made in reference to one H. V. Boynton; and if the House will indulge me, in order that they may vote intelligently upon this resolution, I will send to the Clerk's desk to have read the statement that I made to Mr. Boynton in a letter in response to a scurrilous letter of his. After that I desire to make a further suggestion or two.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1884—9 a. m.

H. V. BOYNTON:

About 12 o'clock last night some person handed me at my rooms an envelope which seemed to be addressed in your handwriting, and which contained a printed card of yours on the subject of your guilt in the matter of a scheme to pass a bill through the last Congress. This morning I found a letter of yours on my table (where it had been left in my absence), marked "personal," dated the 26th instant, asking an investigation of your practices by the House, and threatening to publish the letter unless by to-day's session I moved an investigation. Your conduct has placed you so far outside of the pale of a gentleman as to make it a degradation to notice you. You have been so often shown to be a liar and defamer of character that it has become unnecessary to deny anything you may say. And you conceive it to be the business of the Congress to occupy its time in investigating your bad deeds—to thus dignify you.

You colleague (W. B. Shaw) in defaming me, and who presided last spring over a meeting of a few members of the press to condemn me, was many years ago shown (and he was compelled to admit the fact, as appears by public records) to have taken $15,000 as a lobbyist while a correspondent, and so far as I know he has had the privilege of the press gallery ever since. That meeting refused to investigate the truth of the charges against me at your and his instance, when they must have been known to both to be false.

Do you think the present House should investigate each case of your violation of all manliness by daily lying about me in the press and otherwise and appealing to others to do the same, as I am informed? Does not such conduct on your part forfeit all right you may have to sit with gentlemen of the press?

I shall not move the investigation you seek, because I do not believe it is the business of the House of Representatives to investigate your corrupt conduct. There is no rule of the House against your being a lobbyist.

The members of the last House know you lied in your publication that I opened the press gallery for the admission of members' wives the closing night of last session.

All the present House know you lied when you published that when seats were about to be drawn I went in haste to Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and asked him to request the privilege of my being allowed to select one, &c., to which objection was made. These and other like matters need no investigation by the House to learn their falsity.

I know you forged a letter last summer and published it to the country, purporting to have been written by me to the Secretary of the Treasury, giving a date, and this about a matter of no great importance, but, as I was informed at the time, merely to injure me.

Your printed card has been rightly interpreted by the public as an advance confession of your guilt as a lobbyist.

If when you told me, near the close of the last Congress, I was a fool for not making money while Speaker as Blaine and Colfax had done, and that there was still plenty to be made if the McGarrahan bill could be gotten through, I had thrown you, as you deserved, from my room, I suppose it would have been wiser for me. But up to that time you and I had been on good terms, although I had been warned by friends and your public reputation to beware of you. I treated you leniently, though I have never spoken to or recognized you since. You have from that time to this devoted your work, by all manner of falsehoods, to assailing my character.

You did not say who with you were interested in the McGarrahan bill, but intimated that you had colleagues. My knowledge of the lobby clique was from you. I have had no desire to condemn the correspondents, for I think most of them are gentlemen, but all have suffered in public esteem from your bad example, and some of them have been influenced by you to do what they say they are heartily ashamed of. A correspondent of a newspaper should regard his position as one of high responsibility, and in all things he should at least be truthful.

I do not pretend to say McGarrahan had no merit in his original land claim, but when you explained to me that the bill you desired to have my assistance to get through Congress provided for the issue of many millions of acres of land-scrip which would be of about the value of the Valentine scrip—worth then about $30 per acre and since more—and that there would be abundance to divide, I for the first time learned the scope of the bill, and at once told you it would not pass the Forty-seventh Congress.

I have a letter from you, dated February 27, 1883, asking me to recognize a member named to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which is of a date earlier than our talk.

No person has ever spoken to me in opposition to the McGarrahan bill, and my position against it was taken, as you know, at the time you explained its nature and purposes. I leave it for the public to decide whether the lobby who work for big jobs at the expiration of a Congress do it for pay or sentiment.

The committee investigation you speak of has given you more concern than it has me, but it has afforded you another excuse or opportunity to write and have published more untruths, pretending they are the result of the testimony disclosed before the committee.

I dislike the idea of noticing your letter at all, but as you propose to publish it, it may be due to the public that some of the facts should go out along with it.

Of course you would not publish yours without publishing this with it.

J. WARREN KEIFER.

A MEMBER. What is the date of that letter?

The CLERK. January 28, 1884.

Mr. KEIFER. On a day earlier than the date of that letter—for it is dated on yesterday—I was present with some members when I stated, as I believed then and I feel I know now, what was the reason why certain gentlemen of the press had pursued me for many months; and I had perhaps used an unfortunate expression when I said there was a "clique" of them. It may be true and it may not. It seems to have been reported to General Boynton that I had used that expression, and with a guilty knowledge, and with a hope that he could go before the public in advance in some way, he at once rushed into the papers and commenced denying he was guilty of any connection with the McGarrahan claim in the last Congress. No person, so far as I know, had mentioned it here; certainly I had not up to that time; that is, up to the time of the printed card that is referred to in that letter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this man Boynton appeared to be a friend of mine until about the 1st day of March last, when he came to me with this bill [holding up the bill] in his hand; this identical bill. It was a bill reported to that Congress; and it must be borne in mind that on the 27th day of February he had written me a letter asking me to recognize a member of the House to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, saying that he believed it was right and putting in the usual disclaimer, that he had no interest in it. Perhaps that letter had better be read. I have it here and send it to the desk. The letter is in the handwriting of General Boynton.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 27.

DEAR GENERAL: McGarrahan—you have doubtless heard of him—appeals to me to ask you to give Mr. Dunnell a chance to ask a vote on his (McG.'s) bill.

It has been reported favorably from committee.

To have a vote seems fair enough when one side is a great monopoly, and the bill seems to be a fair one to both sides. I have no interest of the remotest kind in this matter, but have always thought McG. the victim of a rich corporation, and so he has always had my sympathy.

Truly yours,

H. V. BOYNTON.

The SPEAKER.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not sure whether I answered that letter. My recollection is that I did not, either in writing or verbally. But I am sure the next day or the day after Boynton came into my room when others were there, and after waiting and indicating he wanted to talk with me alone when the room was cleared, he commenced a conversation something like this—I am not going to repeat it all:

He said: "KEIFER, what do you think I think of you?" or something of that kind. I said, "I do not know; I hope, well." He replied, "I think you are a fool." [Laughter.] I said that I did not know what he meant. [Continued laughter.] In answer to that he said that I had been Speaker of the House of Representatives, that my term was about to expire, and I might have made money, as Speaker Blaine and Speaker Colfax had done.

He then proceeded to say, with this bill in his hand, that there was plenty to be made yet, if we could get this McGarrahan bill through. Up to that time I had never seen the bill that I recollect of, and knew nothing of its terms. He then proceeded to explain to me its terms and purposes.

He said that it confirmed to Mr. McGarrahan the unsold part of the land claimed by him, all that part that had not been conveyed away to innocent purchasers; and then it provided for the issue of land-scrip in lieu of that portion of the land grant that had gone into the hands of innocent purchasers and could not be reclaimed.

He then explained to me that the bill in a very covert way provided for an appraisement of the present value of all these lands, also for the ascertainment of the value of all the products of the mines that had been taken out by the New Idria Mining Company; and that when that was aggregated the amount was to be divided by, I think he said, $1.25; possibly he said $2.50. The bill is a little indefinite upon that point, and speaks of the Government price for land. My recollection, however, is that he said $1.25. The aggregate sum was to be divided by that amount, and that was to be the measure of the further land-scrip to be issued.

He said that it would amount to some million of acres, and also that that kind of land-scrip was of great value, and cited to me the fact that Valentine land-scrip was then selling in the market for $30 an acre. I believe it has been quoted since then up to $60 an acre. And he called my attention to the fact that a vast amount of money could be made out of it.

Some gentlemen seem to be surprised that the Valentine land-scrip should be so valuable, but it is used to take up unsurveyed and surveyed lands. I believe it is used commonly to take up water rights, where they want to control the surrounding country, and it is thus made very valuable. It has also been used by certain of our railroads in the Northwest to enable them to go in advance of surveyed lands, or where the lands have already been surveyed, and take up town-sites along the line of the road. They have thus been willing to pay almost any price for it. That is the reason why it was run up during the last season, I am told, to $60 an acre.

I have seen an estimate of the amount involved in the McGarrahan bill; I did not get it from Mr. Boynton. The estimate summed up about like this: The amount of this claim sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States was 13,160 acres. The present value and the past product of the mines is estimated at $15,500,000; say $10,000,000. Divide that amount by $1.25, and that will give 8,000,000 acres for which scrip was to be issued. The total aggregate of scrip to be issued was 8,013,600 acres by this calculation. The value of the scrip per acre, taking the value of the Valentine scrip at that time, $30 an acre, would make the sum $240,394,800 if the scrip should keep up to that price. Making a deduction from the present value of the Valentine scrip, allowing for the fall in price on account of the glut in the market, throwing off two-thirds of that amount, would bring it down to the small sum of $80,131,600 as the amount which would result from the issue of that scrip.

I have given this that members may understand what was perhaps the scope of the bill. This statement was not made to me by Mr. Boynton. He used the word "millions" in his statement; said there were "millions in it and millions to divide."

When that interview closed, which was just then and there and he left my room for good reasons, my connection and relations with Boynton ceased, and from that hour to the present moment I have never recognized nor spoken to him. But he has devoted his life to going to other men, to other people, and telling falsehoods and having them published all over this country. He has undertaken to defame me in every conceivable way.

On the last night of the last session of Congress Mr. Boynton and one W. B. Shaw, as I am informed, said that they had found an opportunity to defame me before the country and to make it appear that I was opposed to the combined press and correspondents of the country. They held a meeting and passed a resolution condemning me for opening the reporters' gallery for the admission of visitors to the Capitol.

Now, I want to say here, in the presence of at least a hundred men who know, that that statement was false, that I was probably the only person belonging to that House of Representatives who was opposed to that proposition, and the only person belonging to that House who could not have defeated it. There was no great harm done by it; I blame no one for it. I was appealed to by General McKenzie, of Kentucky, on behalf of some members' wives, to direct that the reporters' gallery be opened to them, which I had the power to do. I declined to do it; repeatedly declined. All I did was to submit to the House the proposition, as the RECORD will show, for unanimous consent to open the reporters' galleries to the families of members. I submitted that proposition to the House and no member of the House objected. Hence it was by the unanimous order of that House of Representatives that the reporters' gallery was opened to the families of members. And this man Boynton and others that followed him have caused to be published over the United States more slanders upon me in consequence of that than could possibly have been imagined about any great crime I might have committed.

Now, if there is anybody here who was present on the occasion referred to, and who thinks my statement is not correct, he can certainly stand up here and correct it. I appeal to Democrats and Republicans on that. [A pause.] Then as a scurrilous, mean, low-lived method of attacking me at this session—I only give it as an instance—when we were drawing seats here for this Congress I was in that part of the Hall. [Pointing.] Somebody asked permission that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] be allowed to select his seat in advance of the drawing, and a similar request was made for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. What took place, I believe, was that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] said, "If this is to go on I will ask permission for General KEIFER to select a seat also;" and in the course of that talk the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] objected to all those requests.

But Mr. Boynton published—and I am told he went from one correspondent to another and appealed to them to send out and publish to the country—that when this was going on I went to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and begged him to ask permission for me, and that when he did ask it it was declined. Now, that was put out simply as a means of debasing me before the country, as he called it.

But I am not going to enter into this subject. If it is thought wise to go into it on the part of the House, let this resolution be thrown wider open. It appears by a statement in that letter, Mr. Speaker, that one of the distinguished gentlemen belonging to the press, who has had for many years the privilege of that gallery without objection, took $15,000 as a lobbyist. That is the man, I want to say, who was selected as the great newspaper chieftain to preside over the body to pass resolutions to defame me.

Now, I will read but a little to show that this statement is true; and I hope the resolution will be opened wide enough to include W. B. Shaw.

Charles Abert was testifying under order of the House before a committee; and, after he had taken the opinion of Reverdy Johnson as to whether he should be required to answer a question, decided finally to answer; and when he was asked to give the names of the persons he had paid money to here in the interest of a lobby for the Pacific Mail Steamship subsidy, he said:

In view of this opinion, and also in view of the order of the House, and also of my own conviction of duty, I feel bound to answer. According to the best of my knowledge and recollection, the first payment which Mr. Irwin directed me to make was—

He then gives a list of persons, among whom this gentleman does not appear. He continues:

Of the amount placed in my hands by Mr. Irwin on the 27th of May, $125,000, already in testimony, I paid May 28—

And among others who are named, with the amounts they received, is W. B. Shaw, $15,000. Further investigation of this testimony will show that Mr. Shaw got this money under various pretenses. I think one of them was that he claimed he was buying votes for this subsidy, and therefore wanted a large amount.

But I turn you to the testimony of William B. Shaw himself. My friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] knows something about this, for I see that he was a member of the committee and put a good many of these questions:

By the chairman:

Q. Please give the committee your residence and occupation.
A. My residence is Washington, D. C. I am a newspaper correspondent.
Q. How long have you been in that employment?
A. About twenty-three or twenty-four years.
Q. Do you know Mr. Charles Abert?
A. I do, very well.
Q. Did you see Mr. Abert at any time during the first session of the Forty-second Congress?
A. I saw him frequently.
Q. Did he pay you any money?
A. He did, sir.
Q. When?
A. I can not tell the exact time. It was in the room occupied by Mr Irwin, on I street.
Q. After the passage of the subsidy bill?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How much money did he pay you?
A. I think it was $15,000.
Q. On what account?
A. Well, for my services, and so forth.

[Laughter.]

I am reading from a report of a committee of this House. I do not want to weary the House, but further on in his testimony Mr. Shaw is asked:

Q. I want to know what your services were?
A. Just what I told you.
Q. Getting information?
A. Getting information, posting them, and letting them know everything about the matter.
Q. Is it a common thing with gentlemen of your profession to sell their information in that way?
A. I do not know that it is. I have been in the habit of doing it for ten or twelve years.

I think this resolution had better be framed so as to include him and others that there may be. If it is the theory that men who have once, in any prior Congress, been guilty of these things shall be regarded as tainted, so that they should never sit with the other gentlemen of their profession who are pure, let this man be included also.

Mr. BUDD. Did you not admit him into the gallery up there?

Mr. KEIFER. What is the question?

Mr. BUDD. As Speaker of the House, did you not admit a gentleman to the gallery that you now claim was a bribed lobbyist?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman for the question. It gives me the opportunity to say that I never knew of this matter until since the adjournment of the last Congress. If I admitted this correspondent ignorantly, my immediate predecessor and others did the same. If there is to be any censure for this act, the present Speaker ought to be included, though I do not suppose he knew anything about it.

Mr. BUDD. You say you did not know Mr. Shaw was a bribed lobbyist, and yet you have stated here that Colonel Boynton was your friend up to about the 1st day of March?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. BUDD. Of last year?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. BUDD. He appeared at your room and attempted to bribe you. Now, did you not, after he had attempted to bribe you, permit him to occupy a seat in the press gallery?

Mr. KEIFER. Congress adjourned two days after that.

Mr. BUDD. During those two days, did you not allow him to come into your room and see you? [Cries on the Republican side, "Oh!"]

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I intended to read only a paragraph or two more from the same man's testimony.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until there is order on the floor of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I will read a further paragraph or two from the testimony of Mr. Shaw:

Q. Did you take the list of yeas and nays on the vote when the subsidy first failed in the House?
A. I did not; I was too much demoralized. [Laughter.]
Q. Did you notice any change in the votes of members between the time when it failed and the time when it passed?
A. No, sir; I never took any notice of it that I remember.
Q. Did you report to your principals after its defeat in the House and its passage in the Senate that it would be likely to go through the House?
A. No, sir; if I had known that fact I would have made more money out of it. I would have loaded up at that time. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it be the business ot this House to investigate all these things I trust it will give to the committee a wide range, so it can call in all these persons. I want to say now that there is no person here or elsewhere who has a higher regard and respect for a well-conducted press than I have. It ought to give the sentiment to the whole country. It ought to lead public opinion, and would, Mr. Speaker, if the public did not know there was so much of this sort of thing that is called venom, envy, jealousy, vice, malice connected with it. For the reason I would not lend myself to Mr. Boynton and such as may have been connected with him to help him and them to get through a bill that was to make them all rich, for that is his own expression, I am traduced throughout this land. And they have the power to induce others to carry on a newspaper warfare against me. That has seemed to be exceedingly singular. I do not know in public estimation I have suffered by it. Perhaps I have. I do know in my own estimation I have not, and I have been willing to stand up and refuse to buy anybody's support or anybody's newspaper compliments anywhere. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have no blame to attach to the mass of correspondents in Washington. I know they have done things time and again that were not right by men going to them and pouring vile falsehoods into their ears and having them published. I understand that all perfectly well.

I do not claim I have been free from just criticism in things I have done in my official life. I am quite willing and have no objection to submit to that sort of criticism. Every public man ought to be subjected to it, because it will make him a better man if the criticism is just.

I might go on here and detail the things they dwell on most are the things I have had nothing to do with. And perhaps I have said all I need to on this case at this time. If it be the right thing now to go forward with this investigation, I certainly should not vote against it. I think your committee should allow the door to be thrown wide open. If you are going to constitute a committee here for the purpose of looking into the immoral conduct of these people in the past, then let it be wide open, so you will not only investigate Mr. Boynton but others equally guilty with him.

I am sorry for him; I have been; I was sorry for any man who would be so low-lived and corrupt as to come to me presuming he might with safety make a vile, corrupt proposition to me.

I hold myself responsible, Mr. Speaker, to my constituents. That is enough. When they are through with me I will go home, not soured with the world, for I have been treated well and beyond the measure of my deserts. I am not one of those who have fallen into the idea that we are living in a more corrupt period than those who have preceded us. I think we are better to-day, better in this country, notwithstanding these abnormal things, than we have ever been before. I am not soured against the public because a few of the millions of the American people make it their life-work to attempt to defame me.

I am proud of my people and am willing to go on to the end and try to do my duty to them; and you may investigate just as much as you please into this or any other matter. I am still going, while I hold a seat in this House, to try to do my duty, unswerved by those who would have me do corrupt things and unswerved by those who would seek to have me pay them for idle compliments.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, General KEIFER has said in regard to this question that the gentleman to whom reference is made in the resolution which I have submitted is unworthy of a seat in this gallery. I think that he himself has made a stronger argument than I could make to justify the necessity for this investigation.

I wish to say for myself that I have no acquaintance with General Boynton. I do not know him now by sight even, and I ask, therefore, in justice to him, that a communication from him which I hold in my hand be read for the information of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What communication do you refer to?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not read it myself, but it is a communication in which I think he asks for an investigation.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be read.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, before that is read I would ask whether this is simply a letter, or a communication from Mr. Boynton asking for this investigation, or whether it includes any reflection upon any member of this House. If it includes any reflection upon any member I shall object to the reading of it at this time. I make this suggestion, as I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows what it contains.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know the substance of it at all.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will be able to give the information I ask.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course if I was cognizant of any such statement in the communication I would not have forwarded it to the desk to be read. It is addressed to the Speaker, and was handed to me with the request that it be read in justice to General Boynton.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this appears to be a communication from General Boynton addressed to the Speaker. It was handed to the Speaker this morning, and was read by him hurriedly and returned to the gentleman who gave it and the Speaker has not seen it from that time until the present. It was read hastily and the Chair is not aware that it contained any reflection upon any member of the House.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall object to its reading unless it be known that it contains no such reflection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What was the statement of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat that it appears to be a communication addressed to the Speaker, and was handed to me this morning. The Speaker, after looking at it hastily, handed it back to the gentleman who gave it, and has not heard of it since. The Chair is not aware that it contains any reflection upon any gentleman, but would not express an opinion without carefully reading it.

Mr. BRUMM. The Chair is not able, then, to state whether or not it is a proper communication to read before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not like to make a decision as to whether it does or does not reflect upon a member of the House without looking at it again.

Mr. BRUMM. Then if there is any doubt I object to the reading.

Mr. THOMPSON. If this is read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would like to ask if any member has a right to object to it?

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not ask to have it read as a part of his remarks if there is anything improper in it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then I should object to it myself if there is doubt upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOPKINS. I replied to a suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky that I did not desire it to be read as a part of my remarks if it contained anything improper or any personal reflection upon any member.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman submitting it says he has not read it himself and does not know its contents.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand the scope of this resolution to be to investigate a gentleman who now occupies a place and exercises certain privileges under the rules of this House. Pending the consideration of that resolution, which simply asks for the appointment of a committee of investigation, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has had read and made part of the records of this House a correspondence, or a part of a correspondence, between himself and the gentleman who is to be investigated. Now, I have nothing to say as to the propriety or impropriety of the introduction of that correspondence by the gentleman from Ohio. That is a question for himself, and I have nothing to do with it. I have no criticism to make upon it; but I do not think that it would be justice on the part of this House to refuse to allow a gentleman whom it is proposed to investigate to have that much of his correspondence read which is now presented along with private correspondence that took place between him and the gentleman from Ohio, and which the House has heard.

Now, it would have been well enough if all this had been left out until this committee had been appointed. That would have been proper. But inasmuch as a part of this correspondence has been read, and that part of it which reflects very severely upon the gentleman we seek to investigate, I think it is but right, if any public sentiment is to be manufactured, that he should be heard also.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided the communication could not be read. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] to decline to have it read as part of his remarks, on the ground that he had not himself read it and did not know its contents.

Mr. GIBSON. But my remarks were addressed, or intended to be addressed, to those who objected to the reading of this letter; and I simply asked them, as a matter of justice all around, as part had been read, to have all read.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was a member who objected to the reading of this communication. And the only objection I had to the reading of it was that the gentleman who put it before the House refused the responsibility for it by saying he would not let it be incorporated in his remarks; and unless some one undertakes the responsibility of introducing a paper I do not see any reason why it should be thrust before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no hesitation in holding that unless the paper is read as part of a gentleman's remarks it cannot be read at all if a single gentleman objects.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] if he will not allow a motion for the reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Rules, and let us dispose of it finally upon the report of that committee. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania see that in this situation it is much wiser to have the report of the committee whether there is proper ground for an investigation and how much should be covered by it? I appeal to the gentleman to let us get the resolution off the floor into the hands of a committee, and let us have their recommendation before we are required to vote on it.

It has been suggested to me that I substitute the Committee on the Judiciary for the Committee on the Rules, and with that modification I make the motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the motion. The gentleman from Iowa moves to commit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My inquiry is, how does that communication get before the House? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] request that it be read?

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I am trying to get at is this: What was done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania relative to the letter?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania sent it to the Clerk's desk, but did not ask to have it read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then there is no motion before the House as to the communication of General Boynton?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have hastily read the communication from General Boynton which has been placed in my hands, and I think there is nothing in it but what is perfectly proper to be read not only in this House but anywhere else. It simply asks that an investigation be had and recites the substance of the charges that have already been stated by the gentleman from Ohio who has addressed the House. Therefore I desire to have a part of my time occupied by the reading of this letter.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question? Did General Boynton ask the gentleman from Illinois to present the letter to the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. The letter is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and I have a right to have it read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. Was the gentleman from Illinois requested by General Boynton to have it read?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will take the responsibility of having it read as a part of my remarks, in justice to General Boynton.

Mr. BRUMM. I have asked the gentleman a question and I think I have a right to an answer.

Mr. SPRINGER. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield and is entitled to the floor. The letter will be read as a part of his remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRESS GALLERY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1884.

SIR: I address you as a correspondent amenable to the authority of the House, and holding a seat in the press gallery under its rules.

I last night received a letter from Hon J. WARREN KEIFER, now a member of the House, charging over his signature that I approached him in his capacity of Speaker of the last House, telling him he was a fool for not making money while Speaker, as Blaine and Colfax had done; that there was still plenty to be made if the McGarrahan bill could be gotten through; that I had colleagues interested with me in that bill; that I explained to him that it provided for the issue of many millions of acres of land-scrip, which would be about the value of Valentine scrip, then worth about $30 per acre, and that there would be abundance to divide.

Mr. KEIFER further notified me that he would not ask an investigation by the House, as I had in writing requested him to do, to the end that his charges might be submitted to the test of an examination under oath.

I can not doubt that the House will consider it of importance to inquire whether there are correspondents enjoying its privileges, and protected in their work by its rules, who carry on lobbying with such effrontery as not to hesitate to approach a Speaker of the House with corrupt proposals.

Having thus called your attention to the grave charges made in writing by ex-Speaker KEIFER, which I pronounce to be utterly devoid of truth, I have the honor to inclose herewith the full text of his letter to me, together with the correspondence pertaining thereto, and through you to respectfully request the House to order an investigation of the matter.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. V. BOYNTON,
Correspondent Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOPKINS. If there is no gentleman who desires to speak in opposition to the resolution I will call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to the previous question being ordered on the resolution and the motion to refer.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, simply to extend the investigation as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that, and I will make my motion to refer cover the resolution and the proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also to inquire and report whether any other member of the press now holding a seat in the reporter's gallery has been guilty of conduct that ought to deprive him of a right to such seat.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the resolution and proposed amendment be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the motion to refer was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 105, noes 136.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. HOPKINS. I believe I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. I object to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will accept the amendment if it is modified so as to embrace any other member of the press against whom charges have been made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will modify my amendment as suggested.

Mr. TALBOTT. I am opposed to the amendment for this reason: I do not believe anybody should be investigated either by a committee of this House or by a grand jury or by any court without some notice. I do not believe a committee of this House has a right to investigate persons occupying seats in the reporters' gallery without notice. Charges have been preferred upon the floor of this House against two members of the press. Those charges ought to be investigated, and I will vote for that investigation; but I do not believe in any such sweeping propositions.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have modified my proposed amendment, and will ask the Clerk to read it as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also to inquire and report whether any other member of the press now holding a seat in the reporter's gallery against whom charges have been or may be preferred is guilty of conduct that ought to deprive him of a right to such seat.

Mr. MILLS. There ought not to be a sweeping inquisition against innocent men. The investigation should be confined to those only against whom charges have been made.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I think this proposition is entirely too broad. I do not believe charges have been made against any other persons in that gallery, at least if they have been made they have heretofore been disposed of. I do not believe it is fair to the press nor fair to this House to appoint a committee to investigate supposed or imaginary charges against newspaper correspondents. I do not believe it is fair or wise or judicious for this House to adopt a resolution directing the appointment of a committee of investigation unless some person has been named and charges against him have been brought forward. For that reason I hope the amendment will not be adopted, neither the one first proposed nor the modification of it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Charges have been made on this floor to-day against certain gentlemen who I suppose are now occupying seats in that gallery. It is due to those gentlemen that those charges should be investigated. It certainly is due to the House that they should be investigated. And if there is any other gentleman in that gallery against whom charges may be preferred, those charges ought to be investigated. I do not know that there are any such.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now demand the previous question on the resolution and pending amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand for a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will do so.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think we should adopt the resolution with one very material amendment. It is admitted that charges have been made against two members of the press occupying seats in the reporters' gallery. It is not claimed that charges have been made against any of the others. It would be highly improper to pass a resolution that would seem to be reflective upon those against whom no charges have been made. Therefore, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will modify his amendment so as to direct an investigation of those members of the press against whom charges have been made, I will vote for the amendment and think it will be adopted without much if any opposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will modify my amendment by omitting from it the words "or may be."

Mr. McMILLIN. That makes the amendment satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The amendment as now modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also to inquire and report whether any other member of the press now holding a seat in the reporters' gallery against whom charges have been preferred has been guilty of conduct that ought to deprive him of a right to such seat.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to submit a privileged report—the report of a conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
JOHN F. MILLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the Clerk read the statement which accompanies the report, in compliance with the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution making an appropriation to enable the President to prepare and dispatch an expedition for the purpose of relieving and bringing home Lieutenant Greely and party submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying conference report.

If agreed to, the effect of the action recommended by the conferees will be to pass the joint resolution without any change from the form in which it originally passed the House.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. In this connection I desire to submit a telegram from the Secretary of the Navy.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 25, 1884.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL:

It seems to me unwise to impair the power of the President to relieve Lieutenant Greely and party by limiting him to sending only volunteers.

This is not to be a scientific exploring expedition, but one to rescue men who were deliberately sent out by the Government with promise of re-enforcement or rescue, and are now perhaps starving or freezing.

Without the limitation volunteers can be accepted if it is desirable. But if none offer by the time the expedition is ready, are the ships not to move? If there are naval officers better qualified to go than any who may volunteer, shall the lives of the explorers, old and new, be trusted to the inferior men? In my judgment Congress, while giving the President for the relief of Greely the money of the Government without limit, should also give him all its power. The officers of the Navy do not, I believe, desire to be protected by statute from orders on any honorable service, however perilous.

WM. E. CHANDLER, Secretary.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add that neither the Committee on Appropriations nor the conference committee deemed it wise to throw around the President any restrictions in relation to this matter. This is the reason which guided the Committee on Appropriations in reporting the resolution originally without any limitation as to the amount, so that the responsibility of this enterprise in every particular might rest upon the President. I ask that the report of the committee of conference be agreed to.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, it was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following business was transacted by unanimous consent:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RAY, of New York, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. KING, for one day.

To Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LUNA, for forty days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WELLER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, for reference to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, papers relating to the claim of E. D. Yule for a horse lost in the military service of the United States.

The motion of Mr. BLAND was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. ELIAS DE WITT HUNTLEY, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the entry in the Journal respecting the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] which was agreed to yesterday. The Chair thinks that the Journal entry should refer to the resolution technically rather than in the language that it does in respect of "alleged outrages," which is not the usual course for proper entries in the Journal.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to move that the Journal be amended by substituting the phrase "resolution of inquiry into certain alleged occurrences in Virginia and Mississippi."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Journal will be corrected according to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Chair hears no objection, and, as amended, the Journal of yesterday's proceedings will stand approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were therefore signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1256) providing for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 229 of the Revised Statutes, statements showing the contracts made by the bureaus of the War Department on behalf of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 194 of the Revised Statutes, the names of clerks and other persons employed in the War Department and the offices thereof from December 1, 1882, to November 30, 1883; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting copies of reports from Maj. J. L. Gillespie of the results of examinations and surveys of Newtown Creek, at Brooklyn, N. Y., and of Shoal Harbor and Compton's Creek, in New Jersey, made under his direction, to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a communication from Capt. D. W. Lockwood, reporting a plan and estimate for a harbor of refuge at Ludington, Mich., made to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; also a copy of a report on the same subject, transmitted to the House of Representatives March 24, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BLAIR. I find upon my desk and ask leave to present a petition of 3,741 of the inhabitants of this District, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, wherein they say that "the undersigned citizens of the United States, feeling and deeply deploring the curse of the liquor traffic in the United States, respectfully petition your honorable bodies to enact a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages within the District of Columbia." The petition is signed by a very large proportion of the representatives of the wealth and culture and worth and, as I think, of the conservative common sense of the people of this city.

Accompanying it I find two or three other petitions from other portions of the country, one of 830 of the inhabitants of the Territory of Washington, another signed by 92 of the inhabitants of Dakota, also another petition with 104 signers from the Territory of Idaho, all praying for the enactment of a prohibitory law in the District of Columbia; and I see scattered about on the desks of Senators other petitions apparently of the same character.

I desire in presenting these petitions to say that for many years it has been the somewhat common practice of the people of this country to send like petitions to the two Houses of Congress, but so far as I know never yet with any tangible effect upon the legislation of this country. I remember when I had first the honor of being a member of the House of Representatives, a few years ago, the honorable Senator from Maine who is at my left [Mr. FRYE] presented a single petition signed by over 27,000 people of this country, praying for such legislation as should have a tendency to diminish the evils attending the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage in the United States. The agitation has increased from that time to the present, and now I look upon it as one of the most serious problems of statesmanship in this country to know how to deal properly with this great evil, not alone from the standpoint of moral reform but as well from the standpoint of the economist and of the statesman. I think it demands as conservative attention, as wise and profound study and action, on the part of the Congress of the United States as any other question that is submitted to them.

Here in the Capitol of the nation for years how to deal with the intoxicating evil has been one of the most serious difficulties. We have enacted a prohibitory law, year after year, in the rules of this body and the other House; and the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in the few remarks which he dropped the other day gave some indication as to how that prohibitory law of both Houses of Congress, applying simply to the Capitol itself and its immediate surroundings, has been enforced. It has come to be understood by the nation at large that the Capitol itself is largely occupied as a national groggery; and I think it is time when, if this is an error, the error should be corrected in the public apprehension, or, if it is a fact, that as a fact it should disappear. What we have enacted in our own rules, and what we have undertaken to enforce so far as the Capitol building itself is concerned, I think we have no reason whatever in refusing to extend to the District at large. Whatever law we make for ourselves and undertake to enforce in this building we may well undertake to enforce in the District of Columbia.

There is no doubt whatever of the authority of Congress upon the subject-matter in this District, and so of the Territories throughout the land. Whether prohibition be the best method of dealing with this evil I shall not on this occasion undertake to argue; but a large proportion of what may be considered as good as any element in the American population believes that it is. In many of the States of this Union it has been adopted as the proper idea to enact into law for the purpose of suppressing this evil. In my own State, in the State of Maine, and in other States, for years the prohibitory principle has been adopted, and successfully adopted; and there is no question upon the statistics of those States that prohibition does prohibit. More recently in the State of Kansas, and in Iowa, and in Southern States, in the State of Georgia, from which I have received reliable data from the prosecuting officers of various of the counties in Georgia, there come like data of an unquestioned character. I have this very morning received, and in this connection wish to lay before the Senate, data obtained from the officials of the State of Kansas representing 66 counties of that State, the substance of which is to the effect that in those counties there were prior to May 1, 1881, 708 saloons. That was the date when the prohibitory law took effect in the State of Kansas. There are now in the same territory, that is in those 66 counties, 313 saloons, 160 (or over half) of which are in Leavenworth, leaving but 153 saloons in the 66 counties not including Leavenworth. Prohibition in less than two years has closed 395 saloons. During this time the population has increased 12 per cent. If the saloons had kept pace with the population, there would now be 792 saloons; so that in reality prohibition has prohibited 479 saloons in the territory named. There is a great amount of valuable data of this same character in this article, which is well authenticated, and I will ask leave, without troubling the Senate to read it at large, to print it in connection with the few remarks which I am now making.

I had a few days ago the honor of presenting, at the request of the National Temperance Society of New York, a bill providing for the prohibition of the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage within the District of Columbia. That has been referred to the committee having in charge the interests of the District at large.

I hope that these petitions will receive the serious attention which they demand. I am not one of those temperance fanatics that we hear something of, because I believe that this evil never will be reached until we radically amend the fundamental law of this nation and provide by constitutional stipulation for the prohibition of the manufacture of the evil, and thus attack it at its source. Yet although not ultra as a temperance man, I do believe that it is possible for us here in this District very largely to restrict the evil which is so common and patent to the observation of us all.

These petitions come here under the auspices and as a result of the efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which I look upon as one of the most powerful agencies for good not only in this country but in the world. I apprehend that this subject will be heard from still further and that it will force itself upon the attention of the American Congress and the American people.

I earnestly trust that as the law of the District is to be modified undoubtedly during the present session, the committee having this subject-matter in charge will very seriously consider whether a prohibitory law here in this which ought to be the model city not alone of this country but of the world is not a thing that can be attained. For one I believe it is the most easy of any of enforcement. A high license law is no better than a low license law, only so far as it becomes prohibitory in its terms; and the principle of the prohibition of crime is the only one which justifies us in legislating against it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks leave to have printed in connection with his remarks the contents of a paper to which he has referred. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The paper referred to is as follows:

PROHIBITION IN KANSAS—A SPLENDID SHOWING FOR READING IN IOWA JUST AT THIS TIME.

TOPEKA, January 19, 1884.

EDITOR REGISTER: On the 4th of December I mailed a series of questions to every county attorney, county superintendent, and police judge in the State for the purpose of learning the effect and present status of prohibition. Replies have been received from over one-third of the 600 letters sent out, constituting a full report from 66 of the 81 organized counties of the State, including all the populous counties. These replies demonstrate three facts favorable to prohibition:

First. That it has materially decreased the number of saloons.

Second. That an unusually large per cent. of the prosecutions under the law have resulted in convictions.

Third. That the principle of prohibition is growing stronger.

It must be borne in mind that these figures come from the officers of the State, without reference to their views upon prohibition, and are therefore not subject to the imputation of being the product of fanaticism. In our letters we stated that we wanted the facts, whether favorable or unfavorable to prohibition. We believe the facts were given, and that the figures presented are as authentic as can possibly be obtained.

In these 66 counties there were 708 saloons prior to May 1, 1881, the date that the prohibitory law took effect. There are now in the same territory 313 saloons—160, or over half, of which are in Leavenworth, leaving but 153 saloons in the 66 counties not including Leavenworth. Prohibition in less than two years has closed 395 saloons. During this time the population has increased 12 per cent. If our saloons had kept pace with the population we would now have 792 saloons, so that in reality prohibition has prohibited 479 saloons in the territory named.

Prior to May 1, 1881, there were saloons in every one of these 66 counties. Today the 313 saloons in existence are confined to 25 counties, over half the number being in a single county. Prohibition has therefore absolutely driven the saloons out of 41 counties in which they existed under license.

"You can't convict the saloon-keepers," has been so often repeated that many regard it as an axiomatic truth. In the early stages of prosecutions it was difficult to convict, but the reports of the officers who have charge of this class of cases show that as a general proposition it is far from the truth. In the district courts of these counties there have been 460 cases tried, resulting in 351 convictions, 47 acquittals, and 62 hung juries, or 7 convictions out of every 9 cases tried.

In justice courts there have been 572 cases tried, with 378 convictions, 75 acquittals, and 59 hung juries, or convictions in three-fourths of all cases tried. In these cases the fines imposed amount to $95,200. In addition to these fines there have been 81 saloon-keepers imprisoned for various periods of time, aggregating 137 months and 19 days, or 11 years 5 months and 19 days.

There has been a larger proportion of convictions in whisky cases than in any other class of cases tried, as reference to the criminal docket of any court in the State will prove. There are now pending in the district courts of the State 218 cases, showing a vigorous determination to complete the work so well begun.

In 51 of these counties the reports all agree that the principle of prohibition is growing stronger with the people; in 7 it is reported weaker, while it remains the same in 8. This of course is a mere matter of judgment. If prohibition can accomplish these results in twenty months, who can say the experiment has failed or how long it will be until the unyielding sentiment of loyalty will crush out the 313 straggling saloons still running?

JAMES A. TROUTMAN.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. I desire before we go further with the morning business, as I suppose the Senate will adjourn early, to call up the conference report that just now came in from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to present a like petition to that which has been presented, so that they may all go together, if the Senator from Maine will allow me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has the floor, and under the rules a conference report is privileged as against petitions and everything else.

Mr. CONGER. I did not wish to antagonize that, but suggested that all the petitions should go together.

Mr. HALE. The conference report will only take a few moments, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the conference committee presented by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

EUGENE HALE,
JOHN F. MILLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly would not have voted for the joint resolution if I believed it placed in the hands of any Secretary of the Navy the power to order an officer of the Navy outside of the line of his duty to go on such a hazardous expedition as this is to be. I do not want to interfere with final action upon the measure, but I think it is wrong and unjust to place it in the power of any one to order an officer of the Navy to go on an expedition that is certainly outside of the line of his duties. No doubt there are many adventurous spirits who would take their lives in their hands and volunteer to go on the expedition, but I do not think that an officer of the Navy should be required to do it when certainly it was not contemplated as a part of his duty to go on such an expedition. When the amendment was offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] it was adopted nem. con. in the Senate, and it certainly relieved my mind from all embarrassment in regard to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that I did not unite with the conferees on the part of the Senate in the report which has just been submitted because I believe that the amendment adopted by the Senate was a proper provision and one that ought to have met with the concurrence and favor of both Houses of Congress. I would not have voted originally for the joint resolution without the provision that was incorporated in it by the amendment and which has been omitted now by the conference committee. Therefore I could not unite with the members of the conference committee in the report which has been submitted.

I do not desire to antagonize the report of the conference committee further than simply to make known my objection to it. I have done my duty in trying to secure to the Navy of the country exemptions from arbitrary decisions of the Secretary of the Navy in reference to a service so extraordinary and so out of the regular line of duty required of the officers and men of the Navy. I have no doubt that officers and men of the Navy fully qualified for this service will gladly volunteer to perform the duty; but I was unwilling, while I believed that to be the case, to put it in the power of the Secretary of the Navy, if he saw proper, if he was actuated by any such feeling as to punish any officer of the Navy by assigning him to a duty which he was unwilling to perform, when others would have been glad and willing to take the position.

I do not know that the Secretary of the Navy would be actuated by any such feeling; I do not know that the Secretary of the Navy would attempt to assign to duty any officer of the Navy or any seaman of the Navy who was not willing to take that service, but I am unwilling to put it in his power to do so if he thinks proper.

I remember in the history of this country that officers of the Navy have been assigned to duty contrary to their wish and against their protests, and unfortunately their lives have been lost. I recall to mind the history of Lieutenant Herndon, of the Navy, one of the bravest men who ever trod the deck of a ship of war, and a man of high intelligence. Every one who has ever read his Explorations of the Amazon will remember with feelings of kindness and regard the memory of that man who perished by accepting a duty that had been assigned to him by the Secretary of the Navy. I do not remember all the particulars, but I recall that he was called upon to take charge of a vessel for the transportation of certain troops; he protested against the seaworthiness of the vessel, and yet he was arbitrarily forced and compelled to take it or resign his commission in the Navy, and he perished in that expedition.

I am unwilling to give this authority to the Secretary of the Navy, because while we give this discretion to the President we all know that the Secretary of the Navy will exercise the power; he will determine who shall be assigned to this duty, and not the President. I am unwilling to put into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy or of the President of the United States the arbitrary power to select officers and men of the Navy who never contemplated such a service on entering into the Navy of the country, and to assign them to a dangerous and difficult enterprise for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his command.

We all know that almost every expedition that has gone up there has met with mishap and misfortune. I believe that Lieutenant Greely and his command volunteered. It is now proposed to invest the Secretary of the Navy with absolute power to assign any officer to this duty and to take an officer who may not be willing to go. Sometimes a man's family relations will not permit him, however willing he might otherwise be, to take service of this kind. We propose now to place all our officers under the control of the Secretary of the Navy and let him assign the men, whereas I have no doubt that if he would call for volunteers there is many a brave and able officer and many a brave and able seaman in the Navy who would gladly accept of this service.

I therefore did not join in this report, and I shall vote against its adoption.

Mr. HALE. The conferees on the part of the House of Representatives insisted squarely that no limitation should be put upon the power of the President in sending this imperatively needed relief expedition. In that emergency, not one that comes infrequently between the two Houses, one or the other had to yield. The Senate conferees yielded, and hence the report is presented as it is.

I can not give so well nor in so few words the moving reasons that controlled the conference in agreeing to this report as by sending to the desk to be read a dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the other House, the same that was read in the House before this report was accepted there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that a telegram from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to a committee of the House of Representatives be read at the desk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 25, 1884.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL:

It seems to me unwise to impair the power of the President to relieve Lieutenant Greely and party by limiting him to sending only volunteers.

This is not to be a scientific exploring expedition, but one to rescue men who were deliberately sent out by the Government with promise of re-enforcement or rescue, and are now perhaps starving or freezing.

Without the limitation, volunteers can be accepted if it is desirable. But if none offer by the time the expedition is ready, are the ships not to move? If there are naval officers better qualified to go than any who may volunteer, shall the lives of the explorers, old and new, be trusted to the inferior men? In my judgment, Congress, while giving the President for the relief of Greely the money of the Government without limit, should also give him all its powers.

The officers of the Navy do not, I believe, desire to be protected by statute from orders on any honorable service, however perilous.

WM. E. CHANDLER, Secretary.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to express my entire dissent from the theory which has been advanced here, that because this is extraordinary duty any officer in the Navy should be relieved from the responsibility and should simply be sent as a volunteer upon this expedition. If such a rule is adopted, and if officers selected for service even as dangerous as this are allowed to retire from that danger and decline to follow the orders of the Secretary of the Navy or the President, then I would give but little for the spirit of the Navy.

I do not deny that this is a dangerous quest. It is a relief expedition. The companions and friends of naval officers are up in that northern region, if alive to-day, suffering and sending home prayers for relief, and only a naval expedition can be sent to rescue them, for this is provided in the joint resolution. It seems to me that any officer who in an emergency of this kind would decline, on being selected, to render this service for the relief of suffering comrades, ought not to remain in the Navy.

I do not deny, as I say, that the service proposed is dangerous; but what is the Navy for? Will there not be times when dangers will arise such as can not be measured by the previous experience of naval officers? It is only because of the heroic spirits that take such risks and dangers that great navies have been built up. Adopt this idea of allowing an officer to withdraw from service and danger, no matter how great, and you will never have a naval establishment that will be an honor to any country. It is no such spirit as that of withdrawing from risk and danger that gave the English navy its Keppels, its Rodneys, and its Nelsons, and it is no such spirit as that which would ever have given to the American Navy its Paul Joneses, its Decaturs, its Farraguts, and the two Porters.

I heard the other day what I was sorry to hear, that when this matter was up, and it was seen that a relief expedition must be sent by the Navy Department for Lieutenant Greely and his comrades, a well-known and quite distinguished officer of the Navy was written to, not by the Secretary, and it was intimated to him that the command of this expedition would be offered to him and a hope was expressed that he would be found in readiness, and the reply came back that if he was ordered to that service he would by every power and influence at his command seek to get the order reversed, so that he might be allowed to stay at home. Sir, we never should have had an American Navy such as has illustrated our annals if that spirit had prevailed.

I heard another instance that came to my knowledge only a day or two ago, reviving an old historic memory that every American ought to be proud of. When the little Monitor was first built by Ericsson, and when naval officers were looking askant upon it, when the sentiment of all naval authorities, with the exception of the few who had studied it and built the little craft and believed in it, was against it, Admiral Worden, then a lieutenant, was written to that that service, dangerous as it was, was at his disposal, and that if he would take the command of that craft it should be his. He was then a young lieutenant. Did he hesitate because here was an unknown and an unprovided-for danger, because nobody else had ever exposed himself to that risk? Back by telegraph flashed the words from that gallant spirit, that dangerous as it was he welcomed it, took it gladly, and he had no lack of other officers and men to follow him, and the great results that made the service of Admiral Worden in the Monitor followed from that.

How long does anybody suppose, who knows that great and gallant officer who is to-day at the head of the American Navy, Admiral Porter, that he would have hesitated when a lieutenant or a captain or whatever may have been his rank if such a danger as this had been presented and he had been asked to take command of an expedition for the relief of naval officers and men who were in these northern regions? Not one moment, sir; and I say here that any good and gallant officer of the Navy, no matter what may be his rank, if he is of suitable age and physical condition, ought to welcome, if need be, such an opportunity as this.

I do not say a word about what has been intimated here as to the method by which these men shall be selected. There is but one object in view; that is, that good ships, commanded by skillful, careful, wise officers shall be sent up there. That is the only thing the Secretary can have in view. My mind is not so made that I can imagine that he would have any other object. I do not want to leave this expedition simply to the men who will volunteer, because I can understand that many a man like Lieutenant Worden, like Captain Porter, now Admiral Worden and Admiral Porter, while they might not hurry to the front to volunteer and obtrude their service, and less brave and less skillful and careful spirits would volunteer, yet when directed and asked to command by the power that should have the discretion would gladly welcome it and go forth; and I hope in this respect that the Navy will be tested, and it may be seen whether any officer who is directed to take command or accompany this expedition wishes to avoid the danger. That is all I have to say, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have never been able to understand why this joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. When the report of the Committee on Rules was under discussion the Committee on Appropriations resented, with a great deal of vigor, the attempt to amend the rules so that the different appropriation bills should be referred to committees having the subjects in charge, or, as it was termed, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The Committee on Appropriations said that that was improper, in violation of the long-established practice of the Senate, and in violation of what was necessary as a basis for the satisfactory conduct of the public business. But here we find the very first important appropriation bill that comes in, with the consent of a member of the Committee on Appropriations, is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in violation of the arguments that had been presented in favor of that very proposition. I will not say that this anomaly is due to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs happens also to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but at least it is a very singular coincidence, and I am somewhat surprised that the Committee on Appropriations and its chairman, who have been so active in asserting the prerogatives of that committee, should not have seen the impropriety of referring a measure so important as this, which belonged to the Committee on Appropriations, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Was he present the other day when this whole matter came up? The bill was reported, and the Committee on Naval Affairs directed me to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations unless it was deemed, in view of the emergency, the exigency hanging over us, that it was not worth while to take more time; and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations arose in his place and stated that under the circumstances he believed it was better to put the joint resolution through. It undoubtedly should have gone to the Committee on Appropriations; but it did not, and that is its history.

Mr. INGALLS. A very convenient arrangement, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Kansas be kind enough to excuse me one moment? I have to be absent from the Senate for a few days. We shall adjourn in a few minutes; and I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Railroads on a bill and to present a memorial from citizens of Columbus, Ga., which will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed by the Committee on Railroads to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 50) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, and ask that it be printed as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Railroads a bill. Is there objection to its being reported at this time? The Chair hears none, and the report is received.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the Columbus (Georgia) Board of Trade, favoring a liberal appropriation by Congress for purposes of public improvements, such as the erection of a public building in that city for the United States post-office and offices of internal revenue, and the establishment of a free-delivery system for mails; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is cause of congratulation, I think, that the Senate has a Committee on Appropriations and a Committee on Naval Affairs that are so courageous, that are so resolute, and that are so determined to execute its will. I hope that the pertinacity of those committees in adhering to amendments that have been unanimously adopted by the Senate will not disturb the entente cordiale that ought to exist between the two Houses. Here is an amendment that was confessedly of so eminently appropriate a character that there was not a single word said against it from any person, no matter whether he favored the limitation of the appropriation or not. It was presented to the Senate and adopted without dissent from any Senator; and the Senator from Maine comes in and tells us that the House insisted squarely that they would not consent to any amendment whatever to the bill that they had passed and sent to us.

Mr. President, suppose the Senate should insist sometimes, it would be a refreshing novelty; for if there has been an important amendment adopted by the Senate to any bill coming over from the House making appropriations for the last two years that has not been abandoned, I do not now recall it—abandoned I mean by the committees of conference when they have come to consider it. I think, sir, it is time for this business to stop, it is time for the Senate and for its committees to exhibit a little of that courage which the Senator from Maine tells us has been exhibited by the Navy in their efforts to incur the dangers and perils and hazards of the deep.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is this an indication that the conference committees on the part of the Senate will after a while yield so gracefully and quietly to the demands of the other House as they have done in this case? Are we to take this as an indication of what will be the subsequent action of conference committees?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is not an indication; it is one in a long series of actions that have been performed by the committees here extending back for a period of two years, and we have served notice day by day as the Senator from Maine has served notice to-day on the House of Representatives that if they will insist we shall always recede. That is exactly what it means, sir. Time after time, occasion after occasion, when amendments have been adopted by the Senate and bills have gone to conference, the conferees of the Senate come in and tell us that the conferees on the part of the House insisted squarely that they would not permit amendments to be made, and that therefore, in order to prevent the loss of great appropriations in view of the exigencies that exist, the emergencies that require the immediate appropriation of the public money, the conferees on the part of the Senate had felt it to be their duty to yield!

Mr. President, if this is to go on, if this is the rule that is to be adopted, we may as well abdicate our functions and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate may as well be considered auxiliaries and annexes of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

I hope, sir, that this report of the conference committee will not be agreed to. It is an affront to this body. The amendment was appropriate; it met with the conurrence of everybody, and to be told here that it is not to be agreed to because the House squarely insisted that they would not consent to an amendment to the bill that was before us for consideration, it appears to me is beyond the purview of proper legislative action.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not propose to take up any more time of the Senate. I do not think that the Senator from Kansas, by one of those characteristic attacks of his on a subject-matter that is passing along comfortably, is going to inflame the Senate into the feeling that we are on the point of surrendering our rights and the prerogatives of this body to the other branch. There will be conference reports wherein the House of Representatives will yield and we shall come out first best, if there is any first best in such a case, and there will be other cases where the Senate will yield and the other House will come out first best, if it is coming out first best to carry its point.

This was not a case where there was any feeling between the conferees on the one side and the other, but a careful and considerate conference on the whole resulted in the report that has been brought in here. I think the good sense of the Senate, although the amendment did pass the other day unquestioned—there was no debate upon it; the thing was hurried—will sanction the course of the representatives of the Senate, who deemed it better on the whole not to insist upon this amendment put in by the Senate. I do not think anybody is going to be disturbed by the thought that the House is overcoming this body for the rest of the session. There will probably be times enough when the Senate will set itself up on important matters against the House, and we may get into a dead-lock; but there is no precedent involved in this and there is no rule. The Senator from Kansas need not be alarmed about the danger to this body. I hope we may have this matter out of the way this morning.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE MACKEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds it his duty to announce that the hour has arrived when pursuant to the order of the Senate made yesterday the Senate will proceed to the House of Representatives to attend the obsequies of the late Mr. MACKEY.

The Senate proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives, headed by the President pro tempore and Secretary and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Chaplain.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its sitting.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move to dispense with the reading of the merely formal part of the Journal relating to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The remaining portion of the Journal was then read, and the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was then approved.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to submit from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department a resolution and accompanying report.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, for the purpose of prosecuting the inquiry directed by the House in respect to the work on Hot Springs Creek, have power to send for persons and papers; that they be empowered to send some architect and sanitary engineer in the employ of the Government to Hot Springs to inspect the work and report whether or not the plan upon which it is being constructed is a proper one, if it is being prosecuted in accordance with the plans and specifications adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, if the material used is of a kind and quality to make a durable work, and also if the plan in accordance with which it is being done will be hurtful to the health of the adjacent town; and that, for the purpose of meeting the expense of the same, the sum of $500, to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House; and that the committee have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to make it a little broader, so that the resolution would also provide they shall inquire into the general management of the property.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. And also the interests of the Government in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to have the accompanying report read?

Mr. YOUNG. I do, as the House will then, perhaps, better understand the scope of the resolution.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, to which was referred the resolution of the House directing an inquiry as to the manner in which the work of improving Hot Spring Creek, on the Government reservation at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, is being done, and as to whether or not the money appropriated for the prosecution of said work has been properly expended, respectfully report:

That they have not been able to prosecute the inquiry with which they are charged to any reliable or satisfactory conclusion for the want of any adequate power and facilities to obtain the necessary data and information to enable them to do so. They are not authorized by the resolution under which they are acting to summon witnesses, send for papers, nor to expend money. And so far they have only had before them such papers and such verbal information as the Secretary of the Interior has furnished upon their request, who has also voluntarily offered to furnish the committee with every facility at his command to make a thorough investigation of the entire subject referred to them, but of course the power of that officer to do this does not extend beyond his own Department.

The complaint in respect to the plan of the work, the material being used, and its alleged hurtful effect upon the health of the town of Hot Springs, and of the alleged improper expenditure of the money appropriated for its construction comes from Hot Springs through the newspapers published in the town and in memorials forwarded from its citizens and city council, and the committee do not know of any witnesses by whom it is proposed to prove the truth of the charges thus made, who are nearer than Hot Springs, except three or four who are at present in Washington, but who decline to come before the committee unless called by summons to do so.

The committee could no doubt prosecute the investigation expected of them with more satisfactory results by going to Hot Springs and making a personal inspection of the work, or instead to summon witnesses from that place, but in view of the expense which this course would involve they do not at present recommend it, but think it probable that they can obtain sufficient information from the Interior Department, and by sending some architect and sanitary engineer of the Government to Hot Springs to make an examination of the work, and it may be that those at Hot Springs who are interested in it will voluntarily come to Washington to give their testimony before the committee.

The investigation thus conducted will not, the committee think, cost more than $500. The committee has been furnished with the names of seven or eight witnesses who, it is requested, shall be examined. Some of them are in Washington and some elsewhere; but, as before stated, the committee has no power to secure their attendance.

The committee submit this report for such action as the House may see fit to take, with the recommendation that the accompanying resolution be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert after the word "town," where it last occurs, the following:

That they also investigate the general management of the Government property connected with said springs, including leases made, and all matters connected therewith.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he wants an architect instead of an engineer? I understand this relates simply to the improvement of the creek, and it occurs to me that an architect does not seem to be the proper officer for the investigation referred to, but that, on the contrary, an engineer is needed.

Mr. YOUNG. I will say in reply to the gentleman's inquiry there are persons now in the employ of the Government who are both architects and sanitarians, and who, I believe, are called sanitary architects. One or two of those now in the employ of the Government could be detailed for this work.

Mr. KASSON. The work is that of an engineer rather than that of an architect, as I understand the matter, but if the gentleman from Tennessee is of the opinion that the work requires an architect instead of an engineer I do not interpose any objection.

Mr. YOUNG. I have no objection at all to the change, but I believe the resolution will answer just as it is.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it the design that the architect or engineer shall make inquiry as to the management of the property?

Mr. YOUNG. Oh, no; but as to the manner in which the works are being constructed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By whom is this investigation to be made?

Mr. YOUNG. By the committee, I believe.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By a committee of this House?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I raise this point of order: As I understand it the whole question in reference to this resolution is already before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which committee the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] is chairman. As to the question of the rental of the Hot Springs reservation, that I understand to be now before that Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and is undergoing the process of investigation, and I hold it does not belong to this Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a point of order. But even if it were, the House has already referred this matter, as the reports state, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I make the point of order that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana is not germane to this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order comes too late after the matter has been received and discussed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was going to state that the point came too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire by the amendment to make it specific, so that two committees shall not be investigating the same matter.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMEDIATE APPROPRIATION FOR CERTAIN INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution No. 121, with a Senate amendment, for the purpose of referring the same to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The title of the joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMPILATION OF REPORTS OF HOUSE COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference merely.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the expediency of procuring a compilation of the House reports of committees for the use of the several committees of the House.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

CONSTITUTION AND STATE GOVERNMENT, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time two memorials of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, with the request that they be printed in the RECORD and properly referred. One relates to the formation of a State government for Washington Territory and the other to the abolition of Indian reservations.

Mr. WELLER. I must object.

Some time subsequently, the objection having been withdrawn, the memorials referred to by Mr. BRENTS were received, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred severally to the Committee on the Territories and on Indian Affairs. The memorials are as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, TERRITORY OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary.

I, N. H. Owings, secretary of the Territory of Washington, and custodian of the great seal, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of writing with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said Territory, at Olympia, this 12th day of January, 1884.

[SEAL.] N. H. OWINGS,
Secretary of the Territory.

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The people of the Territory of Washington, by their Legislative Assembly, respectfully, but urgently, protest against the further continuance by Congress of the so-called Territorial government, a new creation of Congress, unknown to the Constitution of the United States, the only warrant for such a political anomaly in our institution being based upon a custom sanctioned so long that it has grown to be regarded as the necessary method whereby territory of the nation can be prepared for future States of the Federal Union. Earnestly this people pray that Congress will remove their political disabilities, and that they may enjoy the constitutional guarantee of a government republican in form, where the government derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed. The settlers of this Territory have brought hither to establish a State the necessary intelligence, loyalty, and patriotic motive. It is conceded that they possess the necessary qualifications, but still are they denied the first and most essential element of American citizenship. They dare not participate in the selection of the Chief Magistrate of the nation; they are denied the right to elect their own officers; they can not sue a citizen of one of the States in the Federal courts because they are not recognized as citizens of a State; they are denied representation in the Congress of the United States; they can not make their own laws; they are mere dependents upon your honorable body, who claim to adopt rules for their government under an implied power, that you make rules and regulations as to the disposition of the territory and other property of the Government. In fact, every relation of such a government to the Congress of the United States exhibits a dependence as humiliating as that so terribly denounced in that grandest of indictments drafted by the immortal Jefferson arraigning the Crown of Great Britain for withholding popular rights from our ancestors. Our people are a Commonwealth. We are a State, though denied such name. As a State, as a people, as a community we are entitled to demand that the Congress of the United States guarantee to us a republican form of government. The State, and people of a State, are but equivalent forms of expression, and it is not disrespectful when we urge as the paramount duty of Congress the guarantees to us of a republican form of government. In urgency of which we respectfully submit—

First. That the people are sufficient in numbers to successfully maintain a State government. The population of Washington Territory largely exceeds that of many of the States when admitted. It is not less than 125,000, and well-informed and observant persons place it as high as 150,000. The immigration now and for the past year has been unexampled in the history of the growth of American States and Territories. It is also worthy of remark that transition from Territorial vassalage to Statehood and sovereignty has always been followed by renewed growth; and surely the circumstances and present surroundings of this Territory assure that increased prosperity, importance, and wealth. We beg to refer to the admission of other States. California was admitted with a population of 92,597. Colorado, at the census preceding admission, numbered 39,864, Florida, at the census following admission, had a population of 87,445, while at the previous census it numbered only 54,477. Kansas came in with 107,206. Iowa, at the census before admission, had 43,112. Nebraska, at the census before admission, 28,847; in 1860, 122,993. Nevada, before admission, 6,857; subsequent, 42,491; and in 1880 boasted a population of 62,666. Oregon was admitted in 1859, and at the census of the subsequent year had a population of 52,455. These statistics establish the fact that our population greatly outnumbers that of numerous successful applicants for Statehood. By all the precedents Congress is concluded upon this proposition, Washington Territory possesses the requisite population.

Second. Our people are amply able to maintain a State government. This is demonstrated by a comparison of the valuation of taxable property in this Territory with those of several States in the Federal Union:

Washington Territory in 1883	$44,107,567
Colorado in 1880	43,072,648
Florida	29,471,227
Nevada	29,564,675
Oregon	46,422,817

In the support of an insane asylum, a Territorial penitentiary, and a university the Territory annually expends over $60,000. With the exception of the trifling contribution by the United States for the expenses of trying United States causes, and the salaries of three judges, the district attorney, and marshal, the people pay the expenses of their courts. The expenses of legislation are partially paid by the United States; the people elect the members, but their laws are subject to Congressional approval. The governor and secretary are paid by the United States, but how cordially would the people pay their salaries for the democratic privilege of electing their own rulers. All these expenses are derived from taxation for Territorial purposes in addition to our county, school, road, and municipal taxes. The Territory, devoid of sovereignty, owns no property and can not hold any from which income can be derived, and thus it is the tax-payers are called upon to bear this burden to maintain a government not of their own making.

Third. Our great natural resources, our future wealth, demand such recognition, and they are entitled to Congressional representation to secure their development. With requisite population in numbers, who have demonstrated their ability to maintain government, we pray that our disabilities may be removed and we be restored to those rights which belong to American birthright and citizenship, the right to select our own rulers, to make our own laws. We ask for nothing that is not your duty to confer. We pray only to be allowed to consider ourselves citizens of the United States of America; and, as in right, duty, and good conscience, we will ever pray.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, TERRITORY OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary.

I, N. H. Owings, secretary of the Territory of Washington, and custodian of the great seal, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of writing with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said Territory, at Olympia, this 19th day of January, 1884.

Memorial praying the abolition of Indian reservations.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington respectfully represents that the continuance of race distinction by segregating a particular class of our native population and confining them to reservations, treating them as inferiors and dependent, whether they be regarded as wards of the Government or prisoners upon such reservations, is inconsistent with the progressive spirit of the age and the grand achieved doctrine of the Republic that all humanity are equal before the law, a discrimination on account of race which ignores manhood or equality and uniformity of right as men and women, is at variance with the theory of democratic government, and surely native-born humanity of the United States can not longer be regarded as aliens, nor can communities of such be treated as foreign nations.

That the time has arrived when the Indians should be treated as other men are treated, with the same right to enjoy property, the same right to pursue happiness. That race should not be confined as prisoners upon or be limited to reservations, nor should they enjoy rights to acquire or hold land superior to or different from the American citizen. An Indian is human, he is neither more nor less than a native of our country, and your memorialists believe that a policy which recognizes his humanity and manhood should be adopted. They believe the reservation system of managing Indians a perfect failure, based upon principles radically wrong, uselessly expensive to the Government, unjust and detrimental to the Indian, retarding alike his advancement and the settlement of the country in which such reservations have been declared. Large and valuable regions are continued as a wilderness, withheld from appropriation and cultivation by useful settlers. Indians are restricted to prison limits against their will, often kept there by the strong arm of military power, uniformly by the fear to leave. A vast amount of money is expended by the United States, intentionally for their benefit, but really in the useless employment of white persons, who sign vouchers regularly, but contribute but little amelioration to those who have no desire they shall continue among them, and who tolerate their presence because afraid to expel them. The reservation policy in no wise benefits the Indians. Reservations are by the Indians generally regarded as prison limits, restraining their freedom and pursuit of happiness. They serve to keep alive the traditional prejudice that the Indians are a different, hostile, and inferior race. Millions of acres of land have been withdrawn from the public domain, defeating the beneficent purposes for which reservations were established. In the United States, by the census of 1880, there are about 250,000 Indians, of which 66,407 are called civilized, being in the statistics of the Indian Bureau returned as wearing citizen's dress. The aggregate area of Indian reservations is 241,764 square miles, or 154,741,534 acres, an average of nearly 1 square mile for every Indian, man, woman, and child, or about 4 square miles for every Indian "who wears citizen's dress," or about 16 square miles to each head of a family who wears citizen's dress. In this Territory the reservations amount to 10,821 square miles, or 6,925,748 acres. There are about 14,000 Indians, of whom 4,405 wear citizen's dress, or 2½ square miles to each so-called citizen Indian, about 10 square miles, or 6,400 acres to each of such civilized Indians as are heads of family. The number of agriculturists, or those who have capital or can employ labor to utilize land, is perfectly insignificant, and these poor creatures are made land-poor by having land nominally given to them which they can in no possible way utilize or render a benefit. Thus a charitably intended system is but an unmitigated curse to the drones. The Government has presented an elephant to a squaw or papoose, expecting such helpless one to take care of the huge beast. Such being the practical view of this system after a long trial, your memorialists respectfully urge that it should be abandoned. The Government should assist the Indian by bestowing aid which is practical. To those who wish to acquire and hold land the free and most ample privilege should be extended; those who have no desire to cultivate the soil should not be restricted to reservation limits, where they cannot subsist themselves and those dependent upon them, nor should they be forced to the pursuit of agriculture if they prefer to live by hunting or fishing. Nor is there any reason why an Indian should have forced upon him a large quantity of land when he neither wishes nor requires any, nor can he make any use of it. Neither, if he could cultivate such land, should he be entitled to more than a white man. Your memorialists favor the bestowal of land within these reservations upon such Indians as desire it. Such reservations might for a period be held subject to exclusive entry by Indians, who should be afforded opportunity there or elsewhere to locate 160 acres of land upon terms more liberal than accorded to white settlers. After the expiration of such periods the bar to general settlement, regardless of race, should be removed. Nor could such a policy be other than beneficial to the Indian settler. Even should he be unable to cultivate profitably, he would be surrounded with settlements which would enhance the value and desirability of his lands, and he would be abundantly more profited by surrounding white neighbors than by the improvements made by himself. Large areas of reservation of Washington Territory, which for years the Indians have refused to appropriate, should be opened to settlement. Your memorialists therefore pray that a policy should be inaugurated by which the land within reservations remaining unoccupied at the expiration of a fixed period, say twelve months after notice, should be declared open for settlement alike to whites and Indians; that until said period named Indians exclusively should be permitted to take such lands, that each and every Indian should be allowed to enter a quarter-section, and that no fees should be charged, and that the title should rest in him after one year's continuous residence, but the land should be inalienable for seven years; that the lands heretofore taken by Indians upon any reservation shall be confined to them, with like inalienable condition, and that any Indian who has been restricted to 40 or 80 acres allotment may enter sufficient other land, either on their reservation or elsewhere, to secure to him or her a grant of 160 acres.

STAR-ROUTE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back a substitute for the resolution of Mr. BEACH, of New York, referred to that committee on the 17th instant, and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will be read, after which the proposed substitute of the committee will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to this House all reports, papers of every kind and nature whatever referring to the star-route investigation, made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following substitute:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to this House all reports made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigation, and which have not heretofore been published and made public."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL ON MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Printing to report back House joint resolution No. 112, and ask its consideration, with an amendment recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 4,000 extra copies of the report of the committee appointed by the Postmaster General to devise a more complete system of gauging the rates of pay for carrying the mails on railroad routes under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883; 3,400 copies for the use of the House and 600 copies for the use of the Senate.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments: "In line 4 strike out 'four' and insert 'two.' In lines 8 and 9 strike out '3,400' and insert '1,700;' and in line 9 strike out '600' and insert '300.'"

Mr. SCALES. I am instructed by the committee to ask the present consideration of this joint resolution, and desire to say that this refers to a report of a committee authorized by Congress and appointed by the Postmaster-General to make a report in regard to the best means of carrying the mails on the railroads. The subject is of very great importance.

The resolution called for 4,000 copies. The committee thought 2,000 would answer the purpose both for the House and for the Senate, and they so recommend. I hope the resolution will be adopted with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee, unless a division be called for.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I call for the regular order.

ASSIGNMENT OF ROOMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been requested to state to the House that an arrangement has been made between the Clerk of the House and the Committee on Banking and Currency by which the Clerk will occupy the room heretofore occupied by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Committee on Banking and Currency will take the room assigned to the Clerk by the order of the House. This announcement was thought to be proper because it was a change of an order made by the House itself; and if there be any objection to it, this would be the proper time to make it. The Chair presumes the arrangement will be satisfactory to the House.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will also lay before the House certain executive communications.

There was no objection.

CLAIMS ALLOWED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Hon. H. F. French, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedule of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

QUARANTINE STATIONS FOR NEAT CATTLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from Hon. H. F. French, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an answer to resolution of the House of Representatives directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish a statement showing where quarantine stations for neat cattle imported have been established, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS ALLOWED UNDER ACT OF AUGUST 7, 1882.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a schedule of claims allowed under the act of August 7, 1882, for services rendered and supplies furnished on account of Indian service amounting to $74,493.20; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FEES, ETC., OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of official fees and emoluments received by customs officers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

LATE HON. EDMUND W. M. MACKEY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would also announce the following changes in the committee appointed to attend the funeral of the late Mr. MACKEY, two of the gentlemen appointed not being able to act on the committee:

Mr. AIKEN, of South Carolina, in place of Mr. HEMPHILL, of South Carolina, and Mr. PARKER, of New York, in place of Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MONEY. I withdraw the demand for the regular order, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] may offer a resolution.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 3962, granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be made the special order of the House, as in Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday, the 5th day of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to hear the first portion of the resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order; and the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will modify the resolution by adding that the order shall not interfere with reports from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. REED. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONEY. I renew the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

NATIONAL LA FAYETTE BANK.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY, ETC.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide for the suppression and extirpation of pleuropneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be made the special order for next Tuesday, to continue from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done under this call.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Not by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House unanimous consent can not be asked while this call is proceeding.

J. T. PICKETT.

Mr. RICE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3181) for the relief of J. T. Pickett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY J. HUNT.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY A. LEE.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Mary A. Lee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT H. YOUNG.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1719 for the relief of Robert H. Young. The committee has already reported a general bill which will cover this particular case.

The SPEAKER. It will be regarded as an adverse report, and the bill will be laid upon the table.

The committee were accordingly discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. MONEY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. 2568) to provide for the construction of post-offices in the United States and to increase the efficiency of the postal service, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to; and it was ordered accordingly.

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. MONEY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 872) regulating rates of postage on second-class mail matter at letter-carrier offices; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LETTER-CARRIERS OF BOSTON.

Mr. COSGROVE, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported adversely the petition of Thomas E. Ballard and others, letter-carriers of Boston; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF TERRITORIES AS STATES.

Mr. HARDEMAN, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 216) in relation to the admission of Territories as States into the Union; which was placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ERIE, PA.

Mr. BRAINERD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. H. 1415) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of United States circuit and district courts, the post-office, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices at Erie, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

Mr. PUSEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 441) for the completion of a public building at Council Bluffs, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRAUDULENT VENDORS OF PATENTED ARTICLES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for House bill 3954, a bill (H. R. 4376) to make fraudulent vendors of patented articles guilty of a misdemeanor; which was read a first and second time, placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PATENTS.

Mr. VANCE also, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for House bill 1134, a bill (H. R. 4377) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to patents; which was read a first and second time, placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH F. WILSON.

Mr. HALSELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICAN PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

Mr. HALSELL also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 130) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. SELLERS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 432) to increase the pension of Joseph B. Sellers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NANCY ELLIS.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2979) granting a pension to Nancy Ellis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE HUNTER.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Catherine Hunter; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT CARRICK.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 1536) for the relief of Robert Carrick; when the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEVI ANDERSON.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REBECCA BURCH.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 566) for the relief of Rebecca Burch, widow of a soldier of the Revolution; when the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SARAH DAYTON.

Mr. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1025) granting a pension to Sarah Dayton, widow of Erastus G. Dayton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MILES B. FARLIN.

Mr. BAGLEY also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT NUTT.

Mr. BAGLEY also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2419) granting a pension to Robert Nutt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. LEE.

Mr. BAGLEY also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William B. Lee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES OF HON. E. W. M. MACKEY.

The SPEAKER (at 3 minutes before 1 o'clock). By an order of the House made yesterday, to-day at 1 o'clock was designated for the funeral services of the late Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, and the Senate of the United States was invited by resolution to attend those ceremonies. The Chair thinks that business had better now be suspended, in order that the House may be in readiness to receive the Senate. The Chair requests that the first two rows of seats be vacated in order to afford room for Senators.

At 1 o'clock the Senate of the United States, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by their President pro tempore, with the Secretary, entered the Hall and occupied the seats assigned them, the President pro tempore taking a seat beside the Speaker.

At half past 1 o'clock the casket containing the remains of the deceased member was brought into the Hall, preceded by the Committee of Arrangements, with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and Rev. Rush R. Shippen, D. D., and followed by relatives and friends of the deceased.

Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, read the following:

Lord, let me know my end and the number of my days, that I may be certified how long I have to live.

Behold, Thou hast made my days as it were a span long, and mine age is even as nothing in respect of Thee; and verily every man living is altogether vanity.

For man walketh in a vain shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain; he heapeth up riches, and can not tell who shall gather them.

And now, Lord, what is my hope? Truly my hope is even in Thee.

Deliver me from all mine offenses; and make me not a rebuke unto the foolish.

When Thou with rebukes dost chasten man for sin, Thou makest his beauty to consume away, like as it were a moth fretting a garment: every man therefore is but vanity.

Hear my prayer, O Lord; and with Thine ears consider my calling; hold not Thy peace at my tears.

For I am a stranger with Thee, and a sojourner; as all my fathers were.

O, spare me a little, that I may recover my strength before I go hence, and be no more seen.

Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another.

Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made, thou art God from everlasting, and world without end.

Rev. RUSH R. SHIPPEN, D. D., pastor of All Souls' church, Washington, D. C., then spoke as follows:

"If a man die shall he live again?" is the question of Job in a book that is deemed by many scholars the oldest book of the Bible; and that ancient question comes home to our hearts to-day as again the death messenger has been in our midst and summoned away one who but two weeks ago seemed as strong and full of promise of long life as any of us. Yet he had fulfilled but half the allotted threescore years and ten. And again the question comes to us all with a tremulous thrill, Is this the end?

We come, friends, to-day to pay our tribute of honor and respect—not to eulogize the dead, for he has gone beyond the reach of our poor praise or blame; he has gone to the nearer presence of the Eternal Justice; and trusting in the infinite mercy and justice, we commend his spirit to God, who gave it. His career was brief, but honorable.

When the war closed he had not attained his majority, and in the few years which followed, with swift service, he rose rapidly in the ranks of honorable manhood. His public career you know. It had, as it were, but just begun, and there appeared opening to him a life of promise and usefulness. He had come to a place which honors every man who enters it, but which should be more honored by the men who come hither. It honored him, but he was doing his part to honor the place.

The pulpit says in time of death prepare to meet thy God, but true Christianity teaches us that we do not meet Him only by dying. The teaching of Christ was that God is here. The kingdom of God is around us and within us. You meet God when you live as when you die. In every word you speak, in every deed you perform, you appear before the power of eternal justice which summons you to judgment. And God is as truly in this Chamber, in the ordinary affairs of each day's work, as he is in this solemn hour when he seems to have become more present to our hearts.

It is no part of true Christianity to disparage the noble life we may live here on earth. Jesus refers more to the life here than to the life hereafter, and His teaching emphasizes that living that would recognize God here and now and make us all prepared to meet Him every morning as we rise and every evening with the setting sun. And true Christianity would make life here honorable and noble and divine, and would consecrate the activities of this Chamber as the true service to God of man; and thus would glorify the life that now is.

And so, dear friends, as one has fallen—rather has risen—reminding us of the words, "He is not here, but risen," we will not erect the broken shaft as if life were a failure, as if it were incomplete, but we will recognize the nobleness of the life that now is here on earth, when it is honored with honorable activities, as the true preparation for meeting God.

And the pulpit of the Christian Church has no disparaging word to utter of the life of to-day, nor to glorify the life of the world to come. But the same presence of God, the same principles of noble action, the same honorable purposes that make life here to-day noble to the man who nobly uses it—all these opportunities, these principles, these activities, may be carried out beyond the gate of death, and give promise of a life of glory and nobility in the world to come.

And just as science is teaching us of the unity of the universe, as the telescope lifted to the night's sky shows us planets and suns throughout the firmament, and as the spectroscope is showing us the same constituents which are of this planet are in Jupiter and in the planets and suns of the night's sky, so Christianity would teach us of the unity of the universe, of the spiritual universe that our souls inhabit, the unity of God's kingdom which holds us here to-day, and whose laws and principles sweep out into eternity through the ages which are to come. And the life that is honorable and just here and now, contains the principles of that eternal life which is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever.

And when the pulpit says then prepare to meet thy God in death, what does it mean but to say prepare to meet Him by honorable activities here and now? And the man who lives truly is ready for the presence of God and the morning of the morrow, whether that morrow is to be here on this planet or any other part of God's universe.

And, dear friends, just as gold currency is one which circulates in all nations of this planet, and is good all round the globe, so righteousness is the gold currency that is good in all nations, good in all sects, good in all planets, good throughout the universe. And the very purpose of Jesus Christ and of Christianity is to bring all souls to the standard of righteousness which is God's gold standard throughout all His dominions.

We bring this searching test to ourselves to-day: Are we prepared to meet our God? Dear friends, there are those in this time of questioning who question about the hereafter, and who say the race may be immortal, but individuals perish like the perishing blossoms of springtime.

There is an immortality of the race, but not of the person!

Alas! for that skepticism! It does not meet the grieving of our hearts or the needs of our inner life. Jesus presents immortality of life. Its light shines through hope. He shows a principle of life with God to-day, and God for all time—God on this planet, and throughout the universe. And the whole spirit of His teaching, His words and the surrounding circumstances when He raised to life the son of the widow of Nain; when Lazarus was raised from the dead; His words of hope, His whole life and teachings, point to the conviction that death is not the end of all. It is but the open door. It is but the entrance to immortality.

Let us cherish this hope then of a life of immortality. Let us live as we shall wish we had lived when our last hour shall have come. All that is honorable and good and noble and true in the brother who is gone is but his preparation for the higher service of the world to come; and I maintain that any honorable activity on earth which is of service to humanity, of service to the truth, of service to God, is the Christian's preparation for the divine life of the world to come.

Dear friends, the event that brings us together here to-day makes our hearts beat in unison. It brings us home to the central things of human life. It makes us forget for the moment our party politics. In a government like ours where there is independence and individuality, fostered and cherished by our free institutions, honorable and honest men will always differ. They may agree on the central basis of patriotism, but in their method of administration they will differ honestly. Let them differ. It is well that they should differ. It is well for our country that there may be parties. But let there be a check to the unscrupulous, the bitter, the unbrotherly prejudices and hatreds and rancorous strife which have been a part of our past history, and with which these too often fight each other.

At the open grave we forget our personal hostilities, and honor all that is honorable. Why should it not be so in life? Why may not men differ as brothers, as brother patriots, and still shake hands together?

This event brings us of all sects together. We ask not to-day what was the name of the particular church or the particular creed to which our dead friend belonged; but on the basis of all good religion, on the basis of faith in God, and faith in immortality, of faith in righteousness, which was the central teaching of Jesus Christ himself, all sects unite together. Why shall it not be so in life? Why shall we not recognize all men whose faces are set heavenward, doing their best; recognizing them as soldiers of different regiments in the one grand army of the living God?

We thank God to-day for the Divine Providence and loving care that attended our brother and helped him to do his part nobly in his brief career; and because we see the loving kindness of the Heavenly Father through the thirty-eight years of his brief life we will trust, in that unknown world to which he has gone, that the same principles attend him, the same laws enfold him, the same loving God is with him, the same divine career opens to him, and that his brief career on earth was but the opening door, the promise, the beginning of that noble career that is still to unfold itself as the ages go.

We thank God for His loving providence, and for the lessons of this hour brought home to our hearts of our sure hope of immortality, and we will trust God forever.

Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, then offered the following prayer:

O God, whose days are without end, and whose mercies can not be numbered, make us, we beseech Thee, deeply sensible of the shortness and uncertainty of human life; and let Thy Holy Spirit lead us through this vale of misery, in holiness and righteousness, all the days of our lives; that, when we shall have served Thee in our generation, we may be gathered unto our fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience; in the communion of the catholic church; in the confidence of a certain faith; in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope; in favor with Thee our God, and in perfect charity with the world. All of which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us all evermore. Amen.

The remains of the deceased were then removed from the Hall for interment.

The Vice-President and the members of the Senate afterward retired from the Hall.

The SPEAKER. (At 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) The House will stand adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1884.

Prayer by Chaplain C. C. McCABE, of Chicago.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TRADE WITH CUBA AND PORTO RICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In further response to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, calling for the correspondence on file upon the subject of discriminating duties upon commerce between the United States and Cuba and Porto Rico, I transmit certain papers additional to the papers which accompanied the report sent to you on the 15th instant.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 30, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Patents, showing the operations of his office for the year ending December 31, 1883, as required by section 494 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, urging the necessity for additional clerical force for his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. I wish to correct the matter of printing an executive communication which came in the other day. It is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a Senate resolution, the opinion of the Attorney-General of June 22, 1883, on the so-called longevity clause of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883. The communication and also the opinion ought to have been printed, but nothing but the communication, which is very brief and which does not cover the subject, was printed. I move that the opinion accompanying it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Vermont, praying for the prohibition of the sale, manufacture, and use of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PIKE presented the petition of Lydia E. Graves and other citizens of New Hampshire, praying that the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages be prohibited in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of the Vermont Merino Sheep Breeders' Association, praying that the duties on foreign wool be restored so as to be equal to the tariff of 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRISON. I present the petition of several hundred citizens of Indiana, praying that the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages be prohibited in the District of Columbia; I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a similar petition numerously signed by citizens of Wisconsin, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present still another similar petition from citizens of California on the same subject, and I move it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLQUITT. I present a petition of a number of citizens of the State of Georgia and other States in reference to the alcoholic liquor traffic in the District of Columbia. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of J. I. Daniel, James M. Schumacker, W. T. Forbes, J. E. Hart, John M. L. Engle, and others, prominent citizens of Jacksonville, praying for the extension of the fast-mail service from Charleston Junction, S. C., to Savannah, Ga., and Jacksonville, Fla. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of 1,207 citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of a bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM. I present resolutions, which I suppose may be regarded as a petition, adopted by the Lincoln Post, No. 1, Department of California, Grand Army of the Republic, indorsed by the Department of Maryland, praying that preference be given to soldiers and sailors in all civil-service examinations, provided they have the necessary qualifications. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of James M. Bryan on behalf of the Old Settlers, or Western Cherokee Indians, praying for the payment to them of a certain sum of money alleged to be due from the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of the J. R. Tappan Post, No. 215, Grand Army of the Republic, of Saugerties, N. Y., praying for the pensioning of all veterans of the civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of masters of vessels and others directly interested in navigation, citizens of Maine, praying for the better lighting of the western entrance to Southwest Harbor, Mount Desert, Me.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Samuel S. Harris, Bishop of Michigan, praying for the passage of an act to provide for the collection of statistics of divorce as a basis of future legislation; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of William Young, late private Company F, Twenty-third Michigan Infantry, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to use their endeavors to procure suitable and adequate appropriation to secure deep water at Sabine Pass.

Whereas it is the opinion of learned and scientific engineers that deep water can be obtained and permanently retained at Sabine Pass; and

Whereas this opinion is sustained and proven by recent experiments; and

Whereas great benefits would result to the State by reason of the obtaining of deep water at Sabine Pass: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their endeavors to procure suitable and adequate appropriation to secure deep water at Sabine Pass, in order to meet the growing demands of commerce of the State of Texas.

SEC. 2. Be it further resolved, That immediately upon the passage of this resolution the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress with certified copies of the same.

SEC. 3. Whereas the present session of the Legislature is limited, and matters of great importance will be considered by it, creates an imperative public necessity and emergency that the rule requiring bills to be read on three several days be suspended, and that this resolution take effect from and after its passage; which is accordingly done.

Approved January 24, 1884.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Department of State.

I, J. W. Baines, secretary of state of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the joint resolution passed by the senate of the State of Texas, the house of representatives concurring, approved January 24, A. D. 1884, and now on file in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and have impressed hereon the seal of the State, at Austin, Tex., this January 25, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] J. W. BAINES, Secretary of State.

Mr. COKE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to procure the passage by Congress, at its present session, of an act for the improvement of the entrance to Galveston Harbor on the basis of the pending proposition of Capt. James B. Eads.

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed and our Representatives in Congress are hereby requested earnestly and unitedly to urge the passage, at the present session of Congress, of an act for the improvement of the entrance to the Galveston Harbor on the basis of the pending proposition made by Capt. James B. Eads in response to the invitation of the city of Galveston.

Approved January 25, 1884.

JNO. IRELAND, Governor.

THE STATE OF TEXAS
Department of State.

I, J. W. Baines, secretary of state of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the above is a true copy of house joint resolution No. 18 as passed by the extra session of the Eighteenth Legislature, and now on file in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and have impressed hereon the seal of the State, at Austin, Tex., this January 25, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] J. W. BAINES, Secretary of State.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Joseph Potts and other members of J. H. Paynter Post, No. 90, citizens of Jericho, Cedar County, Missouri, praying for the passage of the equalization-of-bounty bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the petition of Spencer L. Flower, of Hartford, Conn., and a large number of others, praying for the prohibition of the alcoholic liquor traffic in the District of Columbia. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of 69 citizens of the United States, residents of Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia. I wish to say that these petitioners are of the best elements of the population of Iowa, and that the petition fairly represents the dominant sentiment of that State. I wish further to say that personally I am in accord with the purpose and prayer of the petition. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of 807 citizens of Michigan, praying for the prohibition of the alcoholic liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the prohibition of the alcoholic liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying for the prohibition of the alcoholic liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

GUANO ISLANDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands, to report it without amendment, and as there seems to be a necessity for the passage of the bill and it is but a few lines long, I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5574, title 72, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, further suspended, as therein set forth, for the period of five years next from and after the passage of this act.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what that section of the Revised Statutes is, and to have the Senator from Ohio explain the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain it. Section 5574 of the Revised Statutes, page 1080, provides that—

No guano shall be taken from any such island, rock, or key, except for the use of the citizens of the United States, or of persons resident therein.

This is the law regulating the acquisition of guano claims on the unsettled portions of the coast of South America. Then the section provides further:

This section shall, however, be suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of this title for five years from and after the 14th day of July, 1872.

That time is past, and it is now necessary to suspend for a further period of five years the prohibition of the article.

It seems that guano is now intermixed with phosphates found in South Carolina and has become an article of commerce, and that in order to get a market for the phosphates it is necessary to mix the guano with them for exportation to Germany and other foreign countries. It is therefore clearly in the interest of the United States that this bill should pass, so as to make a market for our own products. I believe the production is now confined to the State of South Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. I will ask the Senator to allow the bill to pass over for the present. I should like to look into it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course, except that I am urged by parties living in the same region that the Senator does to have it passed.

Mr. RANSOM. I apprehend that the bill is right, but I desire to look at it.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally, without prejudice.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 310) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 385) for the relief of D. C. Allen, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 436) for the relief of William J. Gamble, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 388) for the relief of David Waldo, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed on the Calendar. I would like to have time to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Education and Labor, I report favorably the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, and submit a written report. There have been some transpositions of the clauses in the original bill and some few changes in its features, so that the committee has reported the bill in a new draught. I ask that the report and the bill with the new draught be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such will be the order, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 422) for the relief of Isaac Minor, administrator of the estate of John Saf, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 641) concerning details from the Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 743) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 212) for the relief of Richard F. Barrett, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 237) for the relief of Frances W. Dyer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 716) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1029) for the relief of Jesse Benton Frémont, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 374) for the relief of Francis L. Valle, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose the Senator from Missouri has a right to have it placed there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 13) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Ky., pursuant to the orders of Maj. Gen. Carlos Buell, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have that bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 452) to remit the forfeiture of the British bark Viscount Canning, and to refund the proceeds of the sale thereof to her owners, Edward D. Morris and C. R. Morris, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1336) granting an increase of pension to Ann Cornelia Lanman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1338) for the relief of Betsey A. Mower; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1339) granting a pension to Frank Gray; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1340) granting a pension to Isaac Reed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1341) to pay to employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld in violation of the eight-hour law; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduce this bill at the request of representatives of the workingmen's interests. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR also introduced a bill (S. 1342) to provide pensions for dependent soldiers, sailors, and officers who have been honorably discharged after three months' service in any previous war, or who shall hereafter be honorably discharged from the service in future wars, at the expiration of twenty years after such discharge, and to their dependent relatives; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1343) granting to the county of Randolph, in the State of Illinois, certain public unsurveyed lands within said county on certain conditions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1344) authorizing the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges, wharves, and docks in the Territory of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1345) for the relief of certain settlers on swamp lands in Minnesota; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to say in connection with this bill that it was framed by the land department of Minnesota, and has the approval of the executive of that State. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I also ask leave on behalf of my colleague [Mr. SABIN], who is necessarily absent from the city, to introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 1346) to legalize and establish the booms, piers, cribs, piling, and all other structures now constructed and erected in the bed of the Saint Croix River, in Wisconsin and Minnesota, by the Saint Croix Boom Corporation, and to authorize the said Saint Croix Boom Corporation to erect and construct similar piers, piling, and cribs in said river, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1347) for the relief of the sufferers by loss of the Government steamer J. Don. Cameron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1348) to relieve commercial travelers from license taxes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1349) for the relief of the heirs of Simon H. Mix, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1350) increasing the pension granted to George W. Graham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1351) for the relief of the Continental Fire Insurance Company, Eagle Fire Insurance Company, City Fire Insurance Company, and Commercial Mutual Insurance Company, all of New York city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1352) for the relief of William McNamara; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers and the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1353) to regulate promotions in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1354) to authorize the voluntary retirement of officers of the Navy after thirty years' honorable service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1355) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1356) for the relief of Caroline M. Montgomery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1357) for the relief of Agnes and Maria de Leon, heirs at law of Rebecca L. de Leon, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1358) for the relief of Daniel Taylor, John T. Hall, James M. Duckett, and John C. Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GROOME (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1359) to enable Mrs. Louisa Holterman (formerly Mrs. Louisa Neudecker), of the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, widow of Gabriel Neudecker, deceased, and Martron D. Lewis, public administrator of said city, having charge of the estate of said Gabriel Neudecker, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters patent numbered 70012 for a process for preparing tobacco; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1360) giving a pension to Mina M. Gwynn, of Kansas City, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1361) giving a military record to Thomas Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 1362) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on the Western prairies;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FRYE iniroduced a bill (S. 1363) granting a pension to Frank S. Hillard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1364) granting a pension to C. C. Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1365) granting an increase of pension to Eugene O'Sullivan, late a sergeant of Company K, Eighteenth Missouri Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. By request of a reputable attorney of this city I desire to introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 1366) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Holroyd, widow and administratrix of the estate of John Holroyd, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1367) granting a pension to Sarah L. Wetter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 49) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of certain officers by the people; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLATT. If the order of the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is through, I ask that the resolutions which I submitted on Tuesday be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of "concurrent and other resolutions" remains.

Mr. PLATT. Is not this the proper time to call up and lay before the Senate the resolutions which I submitted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the proper time the Chair will lay the resolutions before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that the resolutions will lead to any debate. I suppose they are the first business in order under this call.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to offer an order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut insist on his resolutions being now laid before the Senate?

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to their being informally laid aside until the routine of business is concluded. However, I wish to have them considered this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of California, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of A. S. Rosenbaum & Co. be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, subject to the rules of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William McNamara be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. VAN WYCK, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Arent B. Sorensen, heretofore referred to the Committee on Claims and no report made thereon, be taken from the files and again referred to that committee.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. JONAS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 2,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee of the United States Senate on the Mississippi River Improvements be printed; one-half for the use of the Senate and one-half for the use of the House of Representatives.

VINEGAR FACTORIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit the following order:

Ordered, That 500 copies of a hearing before the Senate Committee on Finance, January 30, 1884, in relation to the bill (S. 855) to repeal an act relating to vinegar factories, &c., be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that being done, but there was only a partial hearing, as the chairman of the committee well knows. I would prefer that the matter lie over until we have a full hearing before the committee of both sides.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. BECK. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa. The committee was thin yesterday when the statements were made, and I think it would be well to print them now, but to extend the order so that the statements on each side shall be printed when the committee have heard them. Let the order be made now, so that those members who were not present yesterday may see the statements, and when the other side comes to be heard their statements may be printed as well.

Mr. MORRILL. This provides for printing only 500 copies for our own use.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I think 500 copies ought to go around the committee, as there are only eleven members of it.

Mr. BECK. Five were absent yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the chairman will make the order read "500 copies of the statements already made and any statements hereafter to be made."

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as modified will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That 500 copies of a hearing on January 30, 1884, and any statements to be hereafter made before the Senate Committee on Finance in relation to the bill (S. 855) to repeal an act relating to vinegar factories, &c., be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand the reading. I ask the Chief Clerk to repeat the phraseology.

The CHIEF CLERK. "That 500 copies of a hearing and any statements to be hereafter made"——

Mr. INGALLS. Let it read: "testimony submitted at a hearing."

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read as modified.

The resolution as modified was read, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 copies of the testimony submitted at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Finance January 30, 1884, and any statements to be hereafter made before the Senate Committee on Finance in relation to a bill (S. 855) to repeal an act relating to vinegar factories, &c., be printed for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States, being Executive Document No. 32, first session Forty-eighth Congress, of the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the Senate.

I desire only to say that the reason for this is that the abstract, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, "embraces tables in regard to finance, coinage, commerce, immigration, tonnage and navigation, the postal service, public lands, population, education, railroads, agriculture, and mining," and it is strictly, as it purports to be, a history of all the interests of the United States in the most condensed form I have seen in the last ten years. Every Senator and Representative will want it; every board of trade, every chamber of commerce will want the information; and I hope the committee will act upon the resolution favorably. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NAVAL BILLS.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bills 697 and 698 be reprinted for the use of the Senate, the usual number having been exhausted.

That does not need to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now report the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] January 29.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads are hereby instructed to inquire whether the cost of telegraphic correspondence between the several States and Territories of the United States, or with foreign countries, has been injuriously affected by large stock dividends made by the Western Union Telegraph Company, by consolidations between different telegraph companies, by working contracts with cable or other companies, by the leasing of connecting or competing lines, or by other means.

Resolved, That said committee further inquire whether the Western Union Telegraph Company directly, or through the Gold and Stock Telegraph Company, or any other company or association, have prescribed rules or regulations for the transmitting of press news, or made differential rates whereby discriminations are made restricting the free and independent use of the telegraph by the press.

Resolved, That said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer, and report by bill or otherwise, and in print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

COLLIN ADAMS AND LUCY V. WEATHERRED.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 974) for the relief of Collin Adams and Lucy V. Weatherred, for the purpose of asking that that bill, with the accompanying report, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. Since the report was made certain facts material to the case have been called to my attention which were not before the committee when the case was considered. It is proper, therefore, that the bill and report should be again considered by the Committee on Claims, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. If the morning business is completed, I call up the report of the conference committee which was under consideration yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine calls up the conference report, which was under consideration yesterday, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senator to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions. The question is on the adoption of the report.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate any further than to say this: I am perfectly aware that there is a great deal of impatience felt by members of this body over the result of the previous expeditions to the North Pole. There has been nothing coming from them in any degree commensurate with the money that has been spent and the valuable lives that have been lost or risked. All of that I fully realize and deplore as greatly as any Senator here. I know that under that spirit and feeling of impatience at the failure of these different expeditions there may be a tendency either to put a stop to the proposed expedition or to delay it or to hem it in or to restrict it so that there is danger of its current "turning awry and losing the name of action." I hope that Senators will not under the influence of that feeling, in which I share, let anything be done that shall hinder this relief expedition, and I ask Senators to bear in mind that this is to be a naval expedition for the relief of a naval party which the Congress of the United States sent into that inhospitable and almost unexplored region. Congress put itself on record as declaring that this expedition should be made. Under that power and by that sanction the expedition sailed away to the northern seas and to northern ice and to northern exposure, it may be to death at the north. But while any question remains as to the life of a single person in that expedition which we directed and forced to go there, I believe and hope Senators will bear me out that nothing should be left undone now to hurry up this expedition; and I think in this matter for the relief of a naval party who may be there now living in danger every day, and with the danger increasing every day, that the responsibility should be with the President as to whom he may direct to go there. I have no fear that under this any man will be compelled to go where there is good reason that he should not go; but the President, it seems to me, acting through the Secretary of the Navy, or with him, ought to have the right to search the Navy and select the calm mind, the judicious mind, whose rank, position, and record are a guarantee, so far as we can have any guarantee, that this expedition shall not be a failure, put them upon this expedition and trust to them that we may hear something of this ice-beleaguered party.

Mr. HOAR. My attention was called away a moment from the proceedings of the Senate, and I should like to ask the Senator from Maine to state, if he has not stated, or to restate if he has stated, what was the relation of the Government to the expedition which this expedition is to relieve.

Mr. HALE. The Government made an appropriation in its annual appropriations for the service of the Government relating to the Signal Service. The officer in charge of the Signal Service had pretty much or entirely the control of the expedition, but naval officers were accepted, one of them put in charge of the expedition, and under the appropriation by the Government it sailed on its dangerous quest.

Mr. HOAR. Who gave the naval officer in charge of the vessel his orders?

Mr. HALE. I suppose that the general purpose and character of the expedition was given in the War Department.

Mr. HOAR. The Government?

Mr. HALE. The Government gave the orders undoubtedly. I suppose that for the naval officers the direction and detail was given by the Navy Department; so that it became a governmental affair more than if one Department alone had adopted it. Then the Government followed it up by appropriating money and directing relief expeditions for the rescue of this party, which failed, so that all along from the beginning it is a matter of Government origination, of Government adoption, of Government direction, and if anything can make it one of governmental responsibility, I think this is it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall vote to accept this conference report because on reflection I am satisfied, contrary to my original inclination, that the position of the House is right, and not for the sake of yielding an opinion upon which there may be doubt on the part of the Senate.

The Navy, of course, is created for the ultimate object, where necessary, of exposing the lives of the persons who enlist in it to dangers—dangers by sea and dangers in battle. If it were not for the expectation that at some time or somewhere the safety or the honor of this country would require men to engage in a death-struggle, no navy would exist. The training of the officer, the drill of the crew, the marines, like the training of the officer and the soldier in the Army, is a training of men who spend their lives to be adapted and to be ready to expose those lives when the honor and the interest of their country require.

Now, if one of our ships of war had gone aground on a dangerous reef, as the City of Columbus did off the coast of Massachusetts the other day, and if another ship came by, does any one doubt that it would be a lawful order to a lieutenant or midshipman to take a boat's crew and proceed at imminent peril where there might be but one chance in ten even of the safety of the rescuing party to endeavor to take off from the wreck such of the unfortunate men who might happen to survive? Nobody can question that that would be a lawful order and that the duty would be a lawful duty. It would be dishonor to the officer or the sailor who should resist its performance.

It seems to me that when the Government took the responsibility of sending these men, under its sanction, with its assent, at its expense in large part, into these perilous Arctic regions, it pledged itself to do what is reasonable and fair toward their rescue if they are shut in there by the ice or are in any way exposed to peril and danger of loss or starvation. It seems to me that if in the opinion of the President of the United States, or the head of the Navy Department, or Congress, or of whoever this responsibility may lie on, there is a chance of saving these men which warrants the risk, it is the duty of the Government to risk its men as much as it is to risk its treasure in making the effort. If the question had been raised by one of the officers of this Greely expedition when he volunteered, "Suppose my ship should not come back in the two years or the three years," or whenever she was expected to return, "and there is reason to suppose that the crew and the officers are there starving on a desolate coast, or have lost their ship, or are unable to get out by reason of the ice, will there be an attempt on the part of the American people to rescue me?" does anybody suppose there would have been a negative answer then?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me put in right there what it seems to me fits admirably to that question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. To show what would have been the feeling let me mention this fact: When this expedition went out it went out under orders to so arrange its operations in and about Lady Franklin Bay that the party would be ready to meet a relief expedition that would go to them if they did not report to us and find relief at such place at the mouth of the sound; and to this day that party, proceeding under that order and under that pledge, has no provision made at that place for its relief, and is waiting for the expedition that was promised.

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President, I can not believe that if this were a British expedition there would be any hesitation on the part of the British Government in sending a party for relief. I think if the suggestion were made to the British people whether they would allow a party of Englishmen unsearched-for, uncared-for, to perish under the circumstances which the honorable Senator from Maine has described, the expression of the doubt would be received with a burst of indignation from the entire British public.

Mr. PLUMB. I am willing to accept the statement by the Senator from Maine that the President ought to be empowered to name the commander of this expedition. I conceive it quite probable that there might be volunteers who would not be up to the standard requisite for conducting an expedition of this sort; but I do not subscribe to the idea that seamen should be compelled to go. If there is to be lodged this discretion, or if the President is to be authorized to compel officers to go, for the reason I have named certainly there ought to be volunteers to fill the ranks. The principle of selection might not be so readily applied to the seamen in the Navy. The source of supply might not be as good if it were wider. In addition to that, the burdens of the service that fall upon the seamen are greater than they possibly can be upon the officers, necessarily. They neither get money nor credit out of the expedition, no matter how it results. To them it is exposure, with almost certain death and with no adequate recompense either in money or in the public regard. The officers who go will get whatever reputation is to be gotten out of it. They at least have the privilege, if they are ordered to go and do not want to go and take the risk, of resigning; but that is a privilege which is denied to the seamen of the Navy; and for that reason I would be glad if I could (which of course I can not under the circumstances) move to amend so that there shall be volunteers called for to fill up the ranks. I am in hopes now that if we vote down the report of the committee of conference there may to this extent at least be a further conference between members of the two Houses which may result as I have indicated.

I regard this as very important. We have sacrificed already large numbers of lives unnecessarily and under some compulsion; that is to say, the men have been under more or less compulsion to render this service. We ought now to call for volunteers, not only because that ought to be the test of service, but because I think we shall get a much more valuable crew in that way than we can get by the other means.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, I think there can be no difficulty in securing sufficient officers and men from the Navy to set out on this expedition and expose themselves to the responsibilities of it. If it is better to enlist crews for this special service I have no doubt enlistments will be taken, and the crews will be made up of that sort of men who are best adapted for this northern service.

I signed this conference report because I believed that the provision calling for volunteers was an interference with the discipline of the Navy. I believed moreover that this service which is called for is as legitimate and lawful as any service which a naval officer can be called upon to perform.

It is objected here that it is extra-hazardous. I do not regard it as more hazardous than many enterprises of our Navy during the war and even in times of peace. An officer of the Navy or a seaman joins the service with a full knowledge that he is expected not only to battle against a human foe, but to battle against the elements.

There is no question about this being a Government expedition which is intended to be relieved, because it was fitted out by the Government in pursuance of law, paid for by the Government, and no other agency has had any part in it. It is a simple question here now whether we are going to quibble over the right of the House to insist upon a resolution which they sent to the Senate being passed as they sent it, or whether the Senate is to insist on a certain and I think unnecessary amendment placed upon the bill which must be adopted by the House before the bill becomes a law. While we are quibbling and higgling over this small matter, a matter which I consider of no importance whatever, time is passing which is valuable in the fitting out of this expedition. Not a moment ought to be lost. Practically this expedition will be made up of volunteers. The Navy Department is not going to force a man into this service if he is not desirous of going into it, first, because an officer or a man who has no heart in the service will be inefficient, and if he is in such circumstances as to health or family or is for any reason unfitted for the duty, certainly it would not be wisdom to send such a man upon this expedition. If this amendment be adopted, it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to invite every officer of the Navy to volunteer for this service. No doubt most of them would in that event deem it necessary for them to volunteer in order to keep up their credit as officers of the Navy. Then it would be a matter of selection at last, precisely as it is now; and it ought to be a matter of selection. Men should be selected for this duty of the greatest experience and knowledge of this northern country and this kind of service. They are the men who ought to be selected.

These are the reasons why the Senate conferees signed the report. I thought the House was right. I think yet the House was right. The Government ought to be untrammeled in respect of such matters in fitting out this expedition for relief.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I am glad the Senate conferees agreed with the House conferees, and if I had been present when the proposition was made to amend this bill by a volunteer provision I should have voted against it. There never was a desperate enterprise, there never was a dangerous undertaking, there never was a forlorn hope where a volunteer could not be found to enter in. Sometimes he is led to do it by reckless courage and an absolute disregard of all danger under all circumstances; sometimes he is led to do it by an overleaping ambition for fame; sometimes he is led to do it for notoriety alone, and sometimes for higher purposes.

Mr. President, here is a dangerous enterprise, admitted to be dangerous. Suppose a volunteer presents himself who is actuated only by a reckless disregard of the danger, is he the man to put in charge of this dangerous enterprise? Suppose a volunteer presents himself who is ambitious for fame, is he the man to take charge of this enterprise? Here are two or three vessels with fifty to one hundred lives on board, going out to seek for other lives that are exposed to danger. The man in charge of these vessels must be a man of courage to be sure, but not of reckless courage; he must have courage, but caution; he must be a man of dignity, of power, of will, of care, of prudence. He must be a man who will inspire all under him with implicit confidence when they are to be exposed to common dangers; and the chances that from volunteer service you will get such a man are four out of five against it.

Why, sir, if the history of forlorn hopes and dangerous enterprises could be written as it ought to be written truly, it would appear that four times out of five those enterprises have failed; those forlorn hopes have failed of success on account of the incompetency of the very volunteers who have been led by recklessness to take them; but, sir, history has been colored in these things by admiration for the apparent courage.

Now, if there ever was an expedition which should not be compelled to be given to a volunteer, whatever the motives of that volunteer might be, this is the expedition, and the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy should have the power to select, and should select, the very best man, the man with courage and the man with caution, the prudent man, the careful sailor, the careful navigator, the man calculated best to promote confidence in the men and officers under him, to carry out this great enterprise which everybody admits must be carried out. Why, sir, with the volunteer clause in I would not support the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I said yesterday in occupying the time of the Senate pretty much all I desired to say. Notwithstanding the reasons stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and by the chairman of the conference committee [Mr. HALE], there is still, to my mind, a great deal of propriety in the amendment of the Senate. This is a very dangerous and hazardous enterprise, as is conceded. That it is not in the regular line of the service of the officers and seamen of the Navy is also admitted. With these two admissions made I can not say why we should attempt to force officers and seamen of the Navy into a position of danger to health, life, and limb when it is almost certain that plenty of men will be ready to volunteer.

I am fully aware that the Secretary of the Navy is against this provision which was adopted with such unanimity by the Senate, and I find in the RECORD a telegram which the Secretary of the Navy sent to a member of the House of Representatives, and which was read here at the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] yesterday. I am willing to listen to the Secretary of the Navy and all the heads of Departments, and to accord them that respect due to them in matters connected with their Departments; but I trust the time will never come when the legislative department of the Government will abdicate all its functions at the dictation or request of a Secretary of the Navy.

Why, sir, it is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to execute the laws of Congress so far as they apply to his Department, and to make suggestions in reference to such laws as he deems proper; but as soon as we had incorporated a provision in this joint resolution that he objected to he telephoned to the other end of the Capitol to have the will of the Senate defeated. Accordingly a committee of conference was appointed, and really the behest of the Secretary of the Navy is brought here, and we are asked to rescind our own action because it is not in consonance with the views of the Secretary of the Navy.

Sir, I have all proper respect for the Secretary of the Navy, but I say as one Senator that I will never surrender my own judgment of what is right and proper at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of any other Department of the Government. I believed it was right that this service should be composed of volunteers; I believe it still, notwithstanding the telegrams and telephones of the Secretary of the Navy; and the very fact of the Secretary of the Navy himself being so particularly anxious to have this absolute power conferred upon him, as is now proposed, to select whom he pleases, to say whom he may desire, is an argument to my mind that the power ought not to be given to him.

The joint resolution says the President of the United States shall have the power. We all know that practically the Secretary of the Navy will exercise it. I said yesterday that I did not know that the Secretary of the Navy would exercise the power arbitrarily, but I do not know that he will not do so; and I am not disposed to leave it in his power to do what he may desire. I therefore shall not vote for the adoption of this conference report; on the contrary, I shall carry out the convictions of my own mind by voting against it, because I would not vote for the measure as it was originally brought here, and would not have voted for it without the addition of the amendment which the Senate adopted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as some question has been raised as to what was the origination of the old expedition which we are now in search for, I will refer Senators to the acts of the year 1880. Chapter 72 of the laws of that year is, "An act to authorize and equip an expedition to the Arctic seas." After that was passed, stating its general purpose, it was followed by an appropriation found in the sundry civil appropriation bill on page 447 of the statutes of the next year, 1881, as follows:

> Observation and exploration in the Arctic seas: For continuing the work of scientific observation and exploration on or near the shores of Lady Franklin Bay, and for transportation of men and supplies to said location and return, $25,000.

And the Chief Signal Officer said in his report:

> The original purpose of the expeditions, which reached the Arctic a little more than two years ago, was to establish meteorological stations at which observations should be taken for three years. These observations were to be made simultaneously at similar stations established by the governments of the Argentine Republic, Austro-Hungary, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, and Canada, Holland, Italy, Norway, Russia, Sweden, and the United States.

So that we undertook this work as a Government in conjunction with other governments; and I may say here, touching upon a point raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, that not only is it true that if a British party sent out at that time found in trouble like this would be at once relieved by the British Government, but if we do not send up there promptly this expedition to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party that search will be undertaken and that great work will be adopted by the British Government or some other government, and it will be found out by some government whether these men are alive or not.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, to fully appreciate and comprehend the high sense of honor, the sublime courage, and the magnanimity which clothes as with a garment every officer in the Navy of the United States, it was only necessary to hear the glowing speech of the honorable Senator from Maine yesterday while this subject was under consideration. Constrained as I am at all times to award them high praise for their record in the past, unlike the Senator from Maine, I am not without hope that without any compulsory process, as this bill contemplates, they will fully meet the just expectations of the future. In the presence of his eloquence the Senate was speechless and held its breath. No better argument will be made, no better reason can be given why this report should be rejected. To do otherwise would be, in effect, to deny every allegation he has made in respect of the heroism and self-sacrificing devotion to duty of the officers of the Navy. That all the naval officers would be willing to volunteer and even fight for the honor and glory of going with this expedition seems to be the only logical deduction from his remarks. That it will be so I have no doubt, and therefore it should be left exactly where the Senate amendment left it.

When the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] offered his amendment its justice and propriety was recognized by every Senator, and not a single voice was raised or vote given against it. It stands upon the record as the unanimous wish of the Senate. To send on such an errand an officer who goes unwillingly, if that proves to be possible, is worse than useless, for this is not ordinary duty. To give the Secretary of the Navy the right to select from those who offer their services is quite sufficient. To do more is to insult the whole corps, for it presupposes cowardice and a disposition to shirk a plain and manly duty. I am in full sympathy with the object of this bill, but with the bill itself I am entirely at war. I would not confer upon the President of the United States, much as I believe in him and trust him, or any Cabinet minister, the power to draw upon the public Treasury without limit or hinderance. This is now proposed to be done, while Congress is in session, in a bill prepared and pressed to a vote in both Houses upon the plea that time is valuable and the emergency pressing. Sufficient time has elapsed since this bill was introduced into the House to enable the Secretary of the Navy to have given Congress at least an approximate idea of the cost of this expedition. A limit was sought to be made by the honorable Senator from Kansas when the bill was before the Senate, but for some reason to me not clearly understood it came to grief. It seemed to dawn upon that side of the Chamber, suddenly it is true, that it was a departure from the usual custom of the Senate to limit the Secretary of the Navy in anything upon which his heart was set.

This is not the first case of this kind that has received the consideration of Congress. I call to mind the expedition sent in search of the Jeannette in 1881. The then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Hunt, honest, manly, and modest in all things, came before the committee with all his plans and purposes, without reserve or concealment, and asked for a fixed appropriation of $175,000, which was freely given. An appropriation of $100,000 was made for the purchase of a vessel, for which vessel $150,000 was demanded previous to making the appropriation, but after the passage of the bill the owners quickly discovered that $100,000 was quite the value of their ship, and they hastened to transfer their title to the Government and secure the appropriation. It is my candid conviction if you will appropriate one-half million dollars it will go as far toward the fitting out of this expedition as $1,000,000 will go under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. To limit the appropriation is to give notice to those with whom it deals that the Government has no money to give away except for value, and the public in dealing with the Government have a wonderful faculty of measuring values by appropriations made. Again, Secretary Hunt asked for no power to impress unwilling officers into the service on that expedition. He called for volunteers, and volunteers were not wanting. In striking contrast with the action of Secretary Hunt, we place the bill now before the Senate, which for supreme audacity and bold impudence has never been equaled. It confers upon the Secretary of the Navy practically unlimited discretion as to the cost of the expedition, also arbitrary power over the officers of the Navy, and the Senate of the United States supinely submits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when his name was called). Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. FRYE. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. I do not understand this to be a political question, and will vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA. I also am paired on political questions, but not understanding this to be one, I have voted.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Lapham,	Pike,

So the report was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now report the first bill on the Calendar in order.

Mr. HALE. Before that is done I move that another conference be appointed on the subject-matter just before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist on its amendment and ask for another conference with the House of Representatives on House joint resolution 119.

Mr. HALE. Whatever is done of course should be done without further delay.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me ask the Senator from Maine, if a new committee of conference be appointed will it, under the rules, be competent for that committee of conference to investigate or consider any matter not now in the joint resolution? To illustrate: If it should be the pleasure of the Senate to fix the appropriation at some given sum, could the committee of conference he proposes to appoint have jurisdiction under the rules of that subject?

Mr. HALE. I suppose that the domain in which a committee of conference can act is quite limited. The only things, I fancy, that would be before any such committee are the subjects-matter upon which the two Houses are at odds; and that is only a single question in this case. Upon that question, whoever might be upon the subsequent conference I suppose would go into it considering himself instructed so far as instructions go to a committee of conference; but as to what will be the outcome, and who have finally got to yield, no man here or at the other end of the Capitol can tell. I suppose that but a single matter can be considered.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the Senate understand exactly the true position of this joint resolution. We are making an unlimited appropriation of money, and placing the whole matter practically in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy to expend it, and this, too, while Congress is in session, and when a well-guarded bill can and ought to be passed. To the credit of Congress, for the credit of the whole country, in the name of honesty and common justice to the taxpayers of this country, let the Senate proceed to act, not supinely and at the dictation of the Secretary of the Navy, but in a manner consistent with justice and reason. Let this joint resolution be considered lost by refusing another conference; let a new bill, a well-guarded measure, be introduced; let it be reported back immediately and passed. All this can be done in an hour. No objection will be urged to the consideration of such a measure if properly guarded. Unanimous assent need only to be asked to displace every other matter before the Senate and give it consideration. Sufficient time has elapsed since this bill was introduced in the other end of the Capitol to have enabled the Secretary of the Navy to give an approximate idea of the amount of money needed for an expedition of this character. In short, Congress does not even ask him how much, but instead hands a check signed in blank. It did not take the Secretary of the Navy in 1880 more than two days to ascertain even from the Pacific Slope what the possibilities of relief were and what the needed appropriations of money were for a like expedition. I wish here distinctly to state without any reservation whatever that the Secretary of the Navy does not seem to comprehend that all the people of this country have not implicit confidence in him or his methods.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that this joint resolution without any limit as to the amount of the appropriation comes to us from the popular branch of our Government known as the House of Representatives?

Mr. McPHERSON. To my infinite regret I admit it is so.

Mr. ALLISON. And that that body is in sympathy politically with him and his party?

Mr. McPHERSON. Whatever the House of Representatives may do I am not bound by its action. I hold a commission from the people of New Jersey in another House, and as long as I hold that commission I will guard the Treasury against all assaults like this, whatever the House of Representatives may do or any other Senator here may do.

Mr. ALLISON. I was merely calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that this bill does not come from the Secretary of the Navy to us. It comes from the co-ordinate branch, the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, all of this matter that so much troubles and distresses the Senator from New Jersey was gone over the other day. Amendment after amendment was proposed limiting this appropriation, and on a full consideration of the subject-matters pertaining to that, the Senate deliberately voted down the amendments limiting this appropriation and thereby acquiesced in the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives.

Now I want to say one thing further, provoked thereto by the gentleman's expression of lack of confidence in the Secretary of the Navy. This is not his bill. He in no way sought to urge it upon either House. The conduct and charge of this measure for the relief of these men is conjoint in the War Department and in the Navy Department. The measure originated in the House of Representatives sympathizing with the Senator himself politically. It was there brought forward. The Secretaries of War and of the Navy were summoned before the House committee and gave their testimony, and when the measure came up in this body and was considered by the committee to which the Senate referred it the Secretary of the Navy only appeared in company with the Secretary of War and gave his views; and there is nothing from beginning to end in this matter that shows that the Secretary of the Navy has any interest in it except as an honorable, high-minded, exalted public official.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that the Senate further insist on its amendment and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As I understand the situation, if a new committee of conference be refused, then the joint resolution for all practical purposes is dead. It is then my purpose to introduce a measure covering all the points so far as the judgment of the Senate has been expressed, and in addition to limit the appropriation to a fixed sum beyond which the Secretary of the Navy or any other officer of the Government shall not go. The law-making power of the country having in its hands the right to make or refuse appropriations of money, certainly is pursuing a very extraordinary course when it undertakes, as in this case, to allow the Secretary of the Navy (for it is well known of all men he will be the captain in charge, it belongs to his bailiwick) this unlimited power. The joint resolution says the President of the United States shall exercise it. As much as I believe in the President and trust him, I would confer no such power even upon him. It is a departure from the usual custom of the Government, and there is no necessity for it now. There is no pressing necessity, surely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. May I ask my friend how he can consider the joint resolution dead and out of the Senate? The joint resolution is not dead; the resolution is a live resolution and is in the Senate, and considering it dead and considering it out of the Senate does not make it dead or take it out of the Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. No, not dead; but if the Senate refuse another committee of conference what is the condition then of the joint resolution?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It stands in dispute between the Senate and House.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And it will remain a dispute between the Senate and House; and while it so remains I will try some effective work in the right direction.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The House may recede from its disagreement to our amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. We have no control over the House; and if they prefer to do that, they may do so, of course.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is discourteous to the House not to ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose the bill would be in a condition of suspended animation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. At all events it would be a harmless bill in that condition, and I prefer to leave it in that condition for a little while.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it is harmless as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. The manner in which it is proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to defeat this joint resolution is not only unusual, but I think would be a marked discourtesy to the House of Representatives. They sent us the resolution. We proposed one single amendment. The conferees advised us to abandon that amendment; and now because the House disagreed to the amendment we sent to them we propose not to act upon the resolution at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not hear the Senator. Will he please speak louder?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will try. I say because the House of Representatives, which has never had an opportunity to vote by yeas and nays upon our amendment, sent it to a conference, and because the House conferees declined to agree to the Senate amendment it is proposed that we shall defeat the resolution and refuse a further conference. Between parliamentary bodies a proposition to refuse a conference, to decline a conference, or to defeat a bill after the first conference, or to adhere in consequence of a disagreement, is considered discourteous to the other House. I know that is not intended by the Senator from New Jersey; but in parliamentary law it is a discourteous proceeding, one which the other branch may properly regard as discourteous. That certainly is not the intention of the Senator from New Jersey. It is perfectly in order after the vote which has been taken to allow the resolution to go back to the House and let the House take a vote upon the question of receding from their disagreement or agreeing to our amendment. They can do that, or they can ask a further conference, and the proper motion is the one made by the Senator from Maine to ask a further conference.

I wish now to add one observation further. The Senator from New Jersey opposes this proposition on a different ground entirely from what I do. I am opposed to forcing into this extraordinary service any man against his will, because I do not consider the service called for by this resolution as within the line of duty; but I do not agree with him at all in the proposition stated by him that the gentleman who is charged with the execution of this duty can not be fully confided in. Indeed, I have no doubt that the present Secretary of the Navy would do his full duty in respect to the powers conferred upon him, and would administer this trust as faithfully as any man in the public service.

My objection to receding from the amendment proposed and adopted the other day by the Senate is solely on the ground that I do not think this service is within the legitimate line of duty of an officer of the Navy, and therefore if we desire it to be done it should be done by volunteers as a matter of professional duty or as a matter of pride to gain reputation, and we ought not to impose upon the Secretary of the Navy the duty of selecting by his own will from among the officers of the Navy men to do this extraordinary duty which an officer of the Navy would not contemplate as within the proper line of his duty.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I have no intention to be guilty of discourtesy to the House of Representatives. If it is necessary under the practice which governs the two Houses that this resolution should go back to the House I shall certainly withdraw any objection to such a course, but I wish to impress on the Senate the necessity of doing something to guard the expenditure of the money we appropriate.

When the matter was before the Senate the proposition came from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on the other side of the Chamber, who called attention to the fact that it was a most extraordinary proceeding, and under no condition of circumstances, if I remember his language, would he consent that the President or any officer of the Government should have the privilege of expending the public money without limit and without guard; but somehow or other, too mysterious for me to comprehend, seemingly that side of the Chamber all at once discovered that it was not a proper thing to limit the appropriation at all, and when the vote was taken I think I did not hear a single vote on that side of the Chamber in support of the proposition of the Senator from Kansas. I speak from recollection. If I am mistaken I will make the proper amend.

Therefore, sir, whatever may be the action of the Senate respecting this resolution and the consideration due the House of Representatives, I will test the sense of the Senate as soon as may be by the introduction of a measure touching the question of limiting the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to further insist on the amendment of the Senate and ask for a further conference.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. As the voting on the other side of the chamber indicates that this is not treated as a political question, I am at liberty to vote, notwithstanding my pair, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 52; nays 0, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 112) to print a report made to the Postmaster-General relating to carrying the mails; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, Senate bill No. 19 is in order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MCPHERSON. After the word "quantity," in line 46 of section 12, it is proposed to strike out "than eleven square leagues," and after the word "land," in line 47, to strike out down to and including the word "quantity" in line 49, as follows: "to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity;" so that the whole clause will read:

No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity of land than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

Mr. BAYARD. When this measure was last under consideration I was about to respond to some questions which had been put to me in regard to the limitations, if any, that the Congress of the United States should impose upon the area of the lands and the patents issued under the provisions of this act. The proposition of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], modified by him at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], is to remove the limitation contained in the seventh clause of the twelfth section. The object of the amendment is to defeat the limit of eleven square leagues of land and allow the confirmation to be for any quantity of land in excess. I think it would shorten this discussion if at this time I refer also to a question put by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. He asked me the other day for a definition of imperfect claims, which are alone the subject of the proposed act. At that time I stated it to be any claim which required or would have required had the land remained under Mexican jurisdiction further action by Mexican authority before the land in question could be separated from the public domain. If the Senator will read the language of the Supreme Court on that point, it will be more satisfactory to him. In the case of Carpentier vs. Montgomery, found in 13 Wallace—and I read from the opinion at page 493—the Supreme Court adopt by saying, "We entirely concur in these views," the definition given by the supreme court of California in Banks vs. Moreno:

The precise point under discussion is whether or not the title of Peralta as exhibited by the plaintiff was a perfect title conveying the fee, and which invested him with absolute dominion over a specific parcel of land without any further action on the part of the United States, or whether at the time of the cession of California something remained to be done by the Government which was necessary to invest Peralta with a complete legal title to the specific tract.

In every complete grant conveying a perfect title it is essential that the thing granted be sufficiently described to enable it to be identified. In grants of real estate it is not always necessary to describe it by metes and bounds, or by a reference to actual or artificial monuments, nor by courses and distances. If the tract granted have a well-known name, and the boundaries of the tract known by that name are notorious and well defined, a grant of the tract by its name would doubtless convey the title to the whole. In like manner, a grant describing the tract by reference to the known occupation of the grantor or another—or to another instrument containing a sufficient description of the premises—would be sufficient.

Then it goes on:

But it is equally certain that to constitute a complete and perfect grant to a specific parcel of land it must, in some method, appear on the face of the instrument, or by the aid of its descriptive portions—not only that a specific parcel was intended to be granted, but it must also be so described that the particular tract intended to be granted can be identified with reasonable certainty. It would be a contradiction in terms to say that a specific tract was granted if there was nothing in the grant by which it could be ascertained with reasonable certainty what particular parcel was intended to be conveyed.

According with that will be found in 4 Wallace of Graham vs. The United States showing that one of the requisites of Mexican law was the delivery of what they call juridical possession. Describing the general character of the Mexican or Spanish grants, they were gratuities for missions, for the occupation of vast and unmeasured areas; and I may say those were all granted under multitudinous conditions, conditions for occupation, conditions for improvement, failing which the land was to revert; and there were conditions, as I shall presently show, that they should not exceed a certain area; but after the party had commenced possession and had passed into the occupation of the land, before he could obtain absolute dominion, to use the language of the Supreme Court, the delivery of juridical possession was necessary. Then the judicial official in the presence of the vicinage with careful measurement assigned the possession accompanied by what would be called at common law livery of seisin. As long as the title stood without those confirmatory and complete acts on the part of Mexico, it was an incomplete title, and it remains with the United States to say whether those acts should now be performed by the United States in the shape of a special act of Congress or a confirmation as we propose by a decree of a court that shall be equivalent to the confirmatory act under the Mexican law. If, on the contrary, there is a perfect title and there is no need for further action by the Government, the party stands in possession protected by the laws of the United States just as the Senator or I would in regard to tracts of land held in Delaware or Indiana, and there is no necessity for any other law than that which now exists, and his rights to a possessory action or by the way of trespass or the like are the same as others. That was the guarantee we gave the Mexican people, that they should have all the rights of citizens of the United States.

I should like to advert to a paper preliminary to that I have read, the report of the general land commission of 1880. This was a report preliminary to the one from which I read the other day, and which will be found as an executive document of the Forty-sixth Congress. They are asserting the defects of the law of 1854 by which trials in regard to these claims were to be instituted before the surveyors-general.

The law—

Speaking of the act of Congress of 1854 under which the surveys were to be made and the testimony taken before the surveyors-general in the Territories—

The law was singularly defective in machinery for its administration, and it imposed no limitation of time in the presentation of claims, and no penalty for failure to present. Its operation has been a failure amounting to a denial of justice both to claimants and to the United States. After the lapse of nearly thirty years, more than one thousand claims have been filed with the surveyor-general of which less than one hundred and fifty have been reported to Congress, and of the number reported Congress has finally acted upon only seventy-one. Under the law, only copies of the original title papers were submitted to Congress, and it is not presumed that its committees are so constituted as to make safe judicial findings upon the validity of titles emanating from foreign governments, nor to measure the area of claims whose boundaries rest exclusively upon meager recital of natural objects in terms of very general description. As a consequence the committees of Congress have naturally been reluctant to act with insufficient data upon questions which involved the functions of the judge rather than of the legislator, and as these claims have heretofore pertained to a semi-foreign population in a comparatively unsettled portion of our Territories, business of more importance to the general welfare of the nation has been permitted to exclude these local matters from regular consideration. In the limited number of cases finally confirmed Congress has been compelled to confirm by terms of general description, which have usually proved to include much greater areas of land than Congress would knowingly have confirmed. The established rule of area under the Mexican colonization law was a maximum of eleven leagues to a claimant, being a little less than 50,000 acres, but as illustration of the natural result of confirmation without proper judicial investigation, one confirmation by Congress of two claimants has proved to embrace 1,000,000 acres and another about 1,800,000 acres.

They then pass to consider the change in the character and values of this property, how the enterprise of American civilization impressed its activity on these lands, making it more and more essential that there shall be a precise knowledge of the boundaries of these grants both for the interest of private holders and for the interest of the Government, that it may know which is public and which is private domain.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is anxious as he ought to be and as I am that there shall be the fullest, the most punctilious performance of our treaty obligations as a nation under any law and under any system we may adopt. The commission, whose language I have cited—and I shall presently go back to what I believe to be the authority for that language in regard to the Mexican laws—was composed of men of experience, ability, and character, whose report made on this subject ought to carry great weight, because they were men specially fitted and who made the most careful examination of the whole subject of the public domain with which they were especially charged. Their names I have read before to the Senate; it is unnecessary for me to read them again.

I hold in my hand what may be called the corpus juris of the Mexican law respecting the disposition of the public domain of that republic. The first laws that I shall ask attention to are three separate acts but all in pari materia: First the national colonization law of the 4th of January, 1823——

Mr. GARLAND. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. BAYARD. Rockwell's Spanish and Mexican Law, Mines and Real Estate, and at page 617 of the Compilation. First is the act of the 4th of January, 1823; the next is the amendment of the 18th of August, 1824; and the next is the regulations of November 21, 1828. These three laws extending the operation of the same system, and all together will, I think, be held by the Senate the corpus of the Mexican law on this subject. They are continuous and recited declarations interpretations and extensions of the law of Mexico over the subject of her public lands.

The Senator from Missouri seemed to think that the Mexican act of 1824 had reference and all these colonizations laws had reference only to foreigners. In that he was misled. These acts by name and expressly extended to Mexicans, and natives as well as foreigners.

In this Compilation at the foot of the page on which the national colonization law of the 4th of January, 1823, is found is a note of the editor referring to the laws of the Mexican Congress on the same subject, the general regulation of the 18th of August, 1824, which my friend referred to, and the general regulation of the 21st of March, 1828, pages 451 and 453 of the same volume, showing that they were printed as parts of the law on the same subject. One of them is a law establishing the vara, the league, the sitio, and the hacienda, the table of measures, the computation of lands; perhaps I had better, as it will be a subject of calculation here, read it:

ART. 5. The measurement of land shall be the following: Establishing the vara at three geometrical feet, a straight line of 5,000 varas shall be a league; a square each of whose sides shall be one league shall be called a sitio; and this shall be the unity of counting one, two, or more sitios; five sitios shall compose one hacienda.

ART. 6. In the distribution made by government of lands to the colonists for the formation of villages, towns, cities, and provinces, a distinction shall be made between grazing lands, destined for the raising of stock, and lands suitable for farming or planting, on account of the facility of irrigation.

ART. 7. One labor shall be composed of 1,000,000 square varas, that is to say, 1,000 varas on each side, which measurement shall be the unity for counting one, two, or more labors. These labors can be divided into halves and quarters, but not less.

ART. 8. To the colonists whose occupation is farming, there can not be given less than one labor, and those whose occupation is stock-raising, there can not be given less than one sitio.

ART. 9. The government of itself, or by means of the authorities authorized for that purpose, can augment said portions of land as may be deemed proper, agreeably to the conditions and circumstances of the colonists.

Now here comes article 11:

As one of the principal objects of laws in free governments ought to be to approximate, so far as is possible, to an equal distribution of property, the government, taking into consideration the provisions of this law, will adopt measures for dividing out the lands which may have accumulated in large portions in the hands of individuals or corporations, and which are not cultivated, indemnifying the proprietors for the just price of such lands, to be fixed by appraisers.

Here I take it is the declaration of the fundamental principle of the equal division of property so far as law can effect it. They there announce their hostility to the aggregation of large bodies of land in a single hand, and they announce also their intention that where such have occurred they shall be broken up, the lands shall be subdivided, and the excess shall be paid for to the parties in possession.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Did the Mexican Government deal in the manner he is now relating with grants of land conveyed by the Crown of Spain and held by subjects of Spain in Mexico? Were they dealt with in the manner he has just stated? I speak of that particular class of lands conferred by the Crown of Spain upon individuals and maintained and guaranteed by treaty stipulation with Spain?

Mr. BAYARD. If my friend will let me get through, I think he will see that in the first place it was competent for the sovereignty of Mexico, an independent power, to announce its own doctrine in respect of the real estate within its jurisdiction and provide, as does the United States to-day, for the taking of private property for public use upon just compensation being rendered. Here was in this frame of words a proposition for the distribution of property:

Will adopt measures for dividing out the lands which may have accumulated in large portions in the hands of individuals or corporations, and which are not cultivated, indemnifying the proprietors for the just price of such land, to be fixed by appraisers.

I am stating what was the policy of the Mexican Government and which I apprehend they had a right as a sovereign power, recognized by the United States themselves to-day, to take private property for public use upon rendering just compensation. But to go further in article 18—

Natives of the country shall have a preference in the distribution of land; and particularly the military of the army, of the three guarantees, in conformity with the decree of the 27th of March, 1821, and also those who served in the first epoch of the insurrection.

Then comes the grant to the empresario which I desire to notice:

ART. 19. To each empresario who introduces and establishes families in any of the provinces designated for colonization there shall be granted at the rate of three haciendas and two labors for each two hundred families so introduced by him, but he will lose the right of property over said lands should he not have populated and cultivated them in twelve years from the date of the concession. The premium cannot exceed nine haciendas and six labors, whatever may be the number of families he introduces.

ART. 20. At the end of twenty years the proprietor of the lands acquired in virtue of the foregoing article must alienate two-thirds part of said lands, either by sale, donation, or in any other manner he pleases. The law authorizes him to hold in full property and dominion one-third part.

The calculation is that the three haciendas were fifteen square leagues, that is to say, 75,000 acres, which would be about 275 acres for each family, not each individual.

Article 23 contains an additional condition:

If after two years from the date of the concession the colonist should not have cultivated his land, the right of property shall be considered as renounced; in which case the respective ayuntamiento can grant it to another.

Article 27 declares that—

All foreigners who come to establish themselves in the empire shall be considered as naturalized should they exercise any useful profession or industry by which, at the end of three years, they have a capital to support themselves with decency, and are married. Those who with the foregoing qualifications marry Mexicans will acquire particular merit for the obtaining letters of citizenship.

Article 32—

The executive, as it may deem necessary, will sell or lease the lands which on account of their local situation may be the most important, being governed with respect to all others by the provisions of this law.

Now let us look at the next law in relation to this subject, or the same law with the amendment of 1824. I have shown what the policy of the nation was. I have shown that land speculators or large holdings were not favored. Now we come to the law of colonization as to those foreigners who may come into the territory:

The objects of this law are those national lands which are neither private property nor belong to any corporation or pueblo, and can therefore be colonized.

The twelfth article of that law provides:

No one person shall be allowed to obtain the ownership of more than one league square, of 5,000 varas (6,000 v.) of irrigable land (de regadio), four superficial ones of land dependent on the seasons (de temporal), and six superficial ones for the purpose of rearing cattle (de abrevadero).

That is the distinct, positive inhibition of the law against a larger ownership under any circumstances than eleven square leagues——

Mr. PLUMB. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. BAYARD. Pages 451, 452 of Rockwell. Now comes the next law in pari materia of 1828:

It being stipulated in the eleventh article of the general law of colonization of the 17th of August, 1824—

From which I have just read—that the Government, in conformity with the principles established in said law, shall proceed to the colonization of the territories of the republic; and it being very desirable, in order to give to said article the most punctual and exact fulfillment to dictate some general rules for facilitating its execution in such cases as may occur, his excellency has seen fit to determine on the following articles:

The first of these articles relates to the question raised by the Senator from Missouri.

The governors (gefes politicos) of the territories are authorized (in compliance with the law of the general Congress of the 18th of August, 1824, and under the conditions hereafter specified) to grant vacant lands in their respective territories to such contractors ((empresarios), families, or private persons, whether Mexicans or foreigners, who may ask for them for the purpose of cultivating and inhabiting them.

The fourth article provides, after describing how the petition shall be drawn and presented:

The governor will accede or not to such petition, in exact conformity to the laws on the subject, and especially to the before-mentioned one of the 18th of August, 1824.

If this be so, and under the law beginning with the act of 1823 laying down the positive regulation of restricted area to be held by any person, and declaring as a fundamental policy of the nation that there shall be as nearly as may be an equal distribution of real property, declaring in favor of dividing up lands where large tracts had accumulated in single hands whether of individuals or corporations, and indemnifying the owner for such portions in excess as were taken from him, following that by the distinct provision of the law of 1824 that no man shall own more than one league of one kind of land, six of another, and four of a third, making in all eleven square leagues, and then I find in 1828 that the governor in encouraging colonization, in making these grants for the purpose of securing the cultivation of these wild regions, shall do it in conformity with the laws, especially with the provision of the law of 1824. Now how can it be with the law of 1824 following the law of 1823 restricting the possession to the amount I have stated, and which the land commission have recognized, that any power to give more than eleven square leagues could possibly be imagined?

But that is not all. On the following page in the fourteenth section will be found what the minimum was. Having stated a maximum the minimum was here established of irrigable lands:

The minimum of irrigable land to be given to one person for colonization shall be 200 varas square, the minimum of land called de temporal shall be 800 varas square, and the minimum for breeding cattle (de abrevadero) shall be 1,200 varas square.

These are very limited areas. Those are the three laws applied to the entire Mexican territory. That is, the whole federation and all its dependencies were controlled by these three general laws. Passing on, however, you will find two special acts were made in respect to other territory; that is to say in 1834 a circular was issued by the Vice-President of the Mexican United States exercising the supreme executive power conferred upon him, promulgating certain regulations concerning the lands of Coahuila and Texas, and there you will find that the apportionment to any family was much less. At page 625 it will be found:

To each family which shall engage to colonize in said State there shall be given a tenth part of a sitio de ganado mayor.

There is a limitation of about 500 acres to a family in these States. I find also some regulations of the 8th of December, 1846, at page 633. Without fatiguing the Senate by reading them, I will say that they were all much more restrictive as to the area of land grants than the act of 1824, and that they all show a growth in the strictness of the regulations connected with the measurement of land; and this was natural. As civilization progressed, as these lands filled up, their value increased; the possibility of possession of them and control of ownership increased, and as it did the necessity for measurement and precision of boundary became greater, and the areas of land granted became less. I refer also to page 643 containing the colonization laws for Coahuila and Texas, at sections 11, 12, and 13, and also at page 746, to the amount of four square leagues which were limited for the grant of towns, the pueblo grants, which have been the subject of a great deal of litigation and of very careful decision by the courts of California.

Now, Mr. President, if there be other general laws of Mexico or Spain with respect to the lands in the territories so ceded to the United States, I have not been able to discover them. I have examined the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States since the acquisition of the territory of California and the adjacent territory under these two treaties, and I am unable to find anywhere an unconfirmed land grant passed upon by that court for an amount equal to eleven square leagues. The largest grant of any that I have been able to see was the Mariposa; and Senators may remember the very forcible opinions in dissent rendered by Judge Campbell and Judge Catron in regard to recognizing such vague descriptions there which amounted to ten leagues. In the case of Hornsby there was another grant of nine leagues. But I say here in the presence of lawyers who have examined and are well acquainted with the history of the judicial decisions on this subject that nowhere in the courts of the United States has an unconfirmed grant been passed upon favorably for as much as eleven square leagues of land. That I will agree is not a conclusive argument, but it is entitled to weight. When I have shown the laws of Mexico would have forbidden any governor of Mexico from exceeding the limit of eleven square leagues to any one man, he should not hold it, much less should it be granted, and when they do make grants they do so in vastly smaller quantities. I think the Senate must now be satisfied that the limitation in this bill imposed, after such long and careful consideration by the Committee on Private Land Claims, is just and proper, and fully warranted by Mexican law.

There was something said long ago by the Supreme Court on this subject. In 1863, in the case of Rodrigues vs. The United States, the state of things that we are now invited by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to reinaugurate, the action by a commission instead of a judicial tribunal, was stated by Justice Miller:

No class of cases that come before this court are attended with so many and such perplexing difficulties as these locations by survey of confirmed Mexican grants in California. The number of them which we are called upon to decide bears a very heavy disproportion to the other business of the court, and this is unfortunately increasing instead of diminishing. Some idea of the difficulties which surround these cases may be obtained by recurring to the loose and indefinite manner in which the Mexican Government made the grants which we are now required judicially to locate. That government attached no value to the land, and granted it in what to us appears magnificent quantities. Leagues instead of acres were their units of measurement, and when an application was made to the government for a grant, which was always a gratuity, the only question was whether the locality asked for was vacant and was public property. When the grant was made, no surveyor sighted a compass or stretched a chain. Indeed, these instruments were probably not to be had in that region. A sketch called a diseño, which was rather a map than a plat of the land, was prepared by the applicant. It gave, in a rude and imperfect manner, the shape and general outline of the land desired, with some of the more prominent natural objects noted on it, and a reference to the adjoining tracts owned by individuals, if there were any, or to such other objects as were supposed to constitute the boundaries. Their ideas of the relation of the points of the compass to the objects on the map were very inaccurate; and as the sketches were made by uneducated herdsmen of cattle, it is easy to imagine how imperfect they were. Yet they are now often the most satisfactory, and sometimes the only evidence by which to locate these claims.

These difficulties have rather been increased than diminished by the act of Congress of March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," and the course of proceedings adopted under it by the board of commissioners and the courts. (1 Wallace, 587, 588.)

He proceeds then to state the utterly loose, vague, illusive method by which these boundaries were sought to be stated. He brings up the boards of commissioners, the utterly unsatisfactory character of their returns, and he winds up by saying that the courts have been compelled frequently to grant judgments upon the face of these confirmed titles for the same land to the different parties in whom the title had been adjudged. What was the result of this? The court speak of it as inadvertence; but it is not inadvertence. The court can not make law; they can not control facts. They must apply the law as they receive it from the Legislature, and the facts as the witnesses shall detail them; and if on that law and on those facts a judgment logically can be rendered it is not for them to consider the consequences. Said Justice Miller:

The case before us is an example, containing as many of the perplexities to which we have alluded as can well exist in one case. Its consideration requires an examination of three different claims, which have each, independently of the other, been carried through the board of commissioners and courts, and finally confirmed. (1 Wallace, page 589.)

The present bill is to prevent such a condition of things in regard to these Territories, for the court were then speaking of the land within the limits of the State of California which was the subject of a separate act. It is for the Senate to consider whether they desire to see in the face of this judicial criticism and public experience the same state of things brought about in regard to a more extensive area of lands in New Mexico and Arizona, for there is a very small portion of Colorado left to be affected by this proposed law.

There were other suggestions made which probably it is not necessary now to be answered. I see that the Senator from Michigan who proposed a substitute for the bill and who made many adverse criticisms and asked many questions the other day in regard to this bill has not apparently cared enough for the discussion to remain in the Chamber when it was under consideration as a special order of business. In what I have said I meant to address myself in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. They felt, and properly felt, jealous of the honor of the country and anxious that it should be fully maintained in respect of these Mexican grants.

I will say frankly that I myself felt at one time some doubt whether it was competent for us to impose this limitation upon the extent of a Mexican grant. To-day I say to the Senate, and I believe I have shown good ground for it, that it not only is law but that it is justice. It not only is the Mexican law, which we were bound to fulfill, but we have the superadded obligation which comes to all legislators to deal with questions in the spirit of the day in which they live. The Mexicans themselves have shown you that they did not intend the vague grant to be concluded by a sweep of the hand or a glance of the eye, or a description as to a range of hills or mountains in the far distance. They did not intend that such vagueness should apply when they came to deliver absolute dominion of that land to the person whom they had permitted in the furtherance of a policy to induce and favor immigration to go upon it and occupy it in a manner that should not be injurious to the public but beneficial, and which always, however, was subject to the conditions of the Mexican law. It was intended not only that it should be measured before the delivery of juridical possession should be made (and for want of which parties claimant have been turned out of the Supreme Court of the United States, as in the case of Graham vs. The United States that I read just now), but that it should be within the limitation as to extent imposed by the Mexican law to prevent the aggregation of vast bodies of property in a single hand and destroy the principle of equal division of land among the inhabitants.

As I said before, in the presence of men well acquainted with the current of judicial decision, there is not a case of an unconfirmed land grant in the United States courts where a greater amount of property than eleven leagues, or, I say, ten leagues, has ever been involved. The courts have not been called upon to try that question by itself, because the claims came before them either of a much less amount than ten leagues, or else came before them confirmed by commissioners appointed by Congress or by act of Congress. If Congress shall confirm the grant, the power of the Supreme Court is at an end. The confirmation of the grant has the same effect, says the Supreme Court, as a patent, and they are not at liberty to question it. So when the Maxwell land grant came up and nearly two million acres of land which had been inadvertently and ignorantly granted by Congress from the want of ascertained boundaries or any knowledge of the actual contents had been confirmed to a single owner, the court said: "We are not the law-making power; the political branch of this Government has seen fit to confirm this grant, and we simply declare the law to be as we find it on the statute-book."

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will ask the Senator from Delaware if in the Mariposa case there was not a larger amount than eleven leagues confirmed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAYARD. It amounted to about ten leagues, as stated by the court.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I thought it amounted to a much larger quantity.

Mr. BAYARD. No, it was ten leagues out of a large tract. The amount confirmed by the court was ten leagues. I have the case here, however, and I will read what Judge Catron said in stating the case:

On the 23d of February, 1844, Juan B. Alvarado petitioned the governor, Micheltorena, for ten leagues of land, alleging that the tract which he then owned was not sufficient to support his stock of cattle, and which he was desirous to increase.

That was the petition, and it was upon that amount that the judgment of the court was passed. But here is something that Judge Catron said in his dissenting opinion, not inconsistent with the decision, but descriptive of the concessions under Mexican laws:

To hold that the Mexican Government designed to leave in force for an indefinite length of time large undefined concessions, that might be surveyed at the election of the claimant at any time and at any place, to the hinderance of colonization and to the destruction of other interests, is an idea too extravagant to be seriously entertained; so far from it, the Mexican colonization laws contained more positive provisions to the end of granting distinct and known tracts of land to colonists than did any Spanish laws that have at any time been brought to the consideration of this court. (17 Howard, 571.)

Well might he say so. I hope I have not fatigued the Senate, but if there be doubt in the mind of any Senator, I would ask him to read these laws which I have laid before you, to see how guarded and how full of conditions were all these grants that at first blush appeared to have been made so carelessly. They were, as the Supreme Court has said, gratuities. They were a permission to graze, to cultivate, to let the thousand herds of cattle and horses roam at will. All that was yet subject to the condition of population, of improvement, and finally of strict measurement, before what they termed the absolute dominion could be given to an individual occupant. He was the merest licensee of the Mexican Government until he had completed the conditions under which he was to become the lawful owner and invested with the title, and before that could be, the most careful and vigorous conditions were all to be performed.

The delivery of this juridical possession was a matter of great publicity and of contemplated notoriety. The whole neighborhood was gathered to know whether the rights of individuals were being invaded, and all the publicity that could be given was given to it before the measurement was applied to the land. How could that be applied? In quantities so minute, so small, that they were compelled to apply by law a minimum as well as a maximum before they would insist upon the performance of these formalities; and when you came to the utmost amount, there it stood as a barrier to the powers of the governor, as a barrier to the powers of any official, and that was the eleven square leagues, or in our measures about fifty thousand acres of land.

Nay, further, treating this question to-day and applying all those rules of natural good sense and equity, having reference to the times in which we live, the habits of our people, the intent of the law, the capacity to retain possession or to maintain actual possession of such large tracts of land, I do not doubt that it would be in the power of the United States frequently to refuse the confirmation either by a court or by a legislature to such tracts of land far short of the ten square leagues, which is the maximum which the Supreme Court has yet passed upon in any case not confirmed by act of Congress or by a commission.

But that is not the question now before the Senate. The question is whether, with the report of this land commission, with the action of this committee, the scheme proposed is one that tends to secure justice to private claimants, and at the same time protect the Government of the United States, lest intending to do justice by its individual citizens it may make itself liable to others whose rights may be invaded.

I do not know now that it is necessary for me to speak of that clause of the bill which provides for the issue of land-scrip to the parties whose titles may have been confirmed by the court and patented and find themselves ousted by a preceding settler. Much was said here in regard to floating claims, and of the wrong, and the injustice, and the imposition which has followed the inadvertent grants, as in the case of Valentine and another in which they have floated their scrip over the country, locating it upon any public land that they saw fit. But a limitation of this bill provides carefully against that.

In the first place, the lands which are to be substituted for those which may have been adjudged by the court under their decree are to be within these said States or Territory. There is the first limitation. In the next place, they are to be such lands only as are subject to private entry, and as I understand the land laws of this country until lands have been offered at public sale and withdrawn they are not subject to private entry. Therefore, whether they are to be offered at public sale is a question for the executive branch of the Government and the common honesty of giving an equivalent for lands which in our mistaken performance of a public duty from which we have excluded the true owner through the court or through Congress. I say that duty is a plain one, and in executing it the safeguards have now been imposed which former experience has proved to be necessary.

There is no such thing as a general float of land-scrip proposed in the bill. It is only for the lands within those States and Territories named and which are subject to private entry. No lands, as I understand the public land law of this country, are subject to private entry which have not been offered at public sale under the order of the Executive and withdrawn.

I regret the length of this discussion. I am aware that it is very dry and uninteresting, proven somewhat by the indifference of so many of the members of the Senate upon this subject; but I intended to answer the objections raised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and also by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and to assure them that the bill makes no restriction upon any perfected title, and is the full measure of our duty under the treaties with Mexico.

If people have honestly acquired one acre of land or one million acres of land and their title to that is a perfect title, that is to say all has been done that the treaty with Mexico required either government to perform, the bill does not affect them. It affects the possessory right; it affects the legal right; it affects the legal title of no man; but it does seek as cheaply and as wisely as experience can suggest, according at least to the statement of the land commission, according to the opinion of the Committee on Private Land Claims (from the weight of whose council I entirely except myself) as being the best mode yet suggested, and I hope will now for the third time receive the approval of the Senate and become a law.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the regular order of business long enough to introduce a joint resolution, that I may have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who meet to-morrow morning. I should like to have it read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Is there objection to the introduction of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and it will be received.

The joint resolution (S. R. 50) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $500,000 be and is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and immediately available, to carry into effect the provisions of House of Representatives joint resolution No. 119, and that the expenditure therein authorized to be made shall be limited to said $500,000.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be and hereby is authorized to expend so much of the sum of $150,000 appropriated for the purpose of further instructing and civilizing Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi River, &c., in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 17, 1882 (22 Statutes, page 86), as he may deem necessary for the purpose of erecting and repairing such school buildings as are now in course of construction or for which contracts have been made, and for such other educational purposes as he may consider proper.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 1368) donating 320 acres of public land to each of the survivors of the Mountain Meadow massacre and to each of the legal heirs of any one killed in such massacre; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1369) to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAMAR introduced a bill (S. 1370) for the relief of Washington Ford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1371) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Marie Louise Craven; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 112) to print a report made to the Postmaster-General relating to carrying the mails was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DESTITUTE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said joint resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the President pro tempore appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Chair be authorized to appoint the new conference committee on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

There being no objection, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. SAULSBURY were appointed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MCPHERSON.

Mr. PLUMB. This discussion has taken a pretty wide range considering the nature of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. It certainly ought not to be necessary to argue that proposition at great length. The seventh subdivision of section 12, as reported by the committee, amounted to a declaration by Congress of the legal effect of the Mexican law in regard to the limitation of grants. I think enough has been said already to show conclusively that great doubt exists in regard to the law of Mexico upon that subject. Without expressing any opinion myself upon that point, I will venture to say that I think a question of that kind ought to be submitted to the courts, and that it would not be a fair interpretation and carrying out of the treaty obligation of the United States toward the people who became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo for Congress itself to pass upon a question judicially affecting their rights of property.

If it be as plain, as the Senator from Delaware says it is, that the law of Mexico limited the grant of land to a single individual to eleven leagues, what more proper tribunal could ascertain and declare that fact than the judicial tribunal, whatever it may be, before whom these people are obliged to go to establish their rights under the Mexican law, and obtain also a declaration of their rights under the treaty and under the laws of the United States? This is one of those questions, therefore, which we can properly leave, and can only properly leave, to the judicial tribunal which is to pass upon the ultimate rights of these parties to the grants of land which they claim under the law of Mexico.

But this discussion having taken the range that it has done, and having embraced practically all the essential features of the bill, I propose to state some of the objections which occur to me in regard to it.

Mr. LAPHAM. Before the Senator passes to that point will he allow me to make a suggestion? I have the same difficulty which the Senator has. Does not the seventh clause under consideration accomplish all we can do when we strike out the first portion of the clause and provide that "no confirmation shall be for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim?"

Mr. PLUMB. That is the position which I take in regard to the matter. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey covers that point exactly.

Mr. LAPHAM. I think it does admirably.

Mr. PLUMB. It covers it entirely.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to interrupt my friend from Kansas but would merely ask him whether he would object to letting us take the question upon the amendments as we go along, and then raising new questions and settling them one by one as we come to them?

Mr. PLUMB. I had not designed to move to amend the bill, but to address myself to some objections which occurred to me to the entire structure of it, and which, as I think, make it totally inapplicable to the case we are considering. I was about to say that I think in some respects it is unnecessarily restrictive in its character, and will work great injustice to a class of people who are dependent upon us entirely for the measure of their rights, or rather for what they are to get as the result of our acquisition of them and their property by the treaty. On the other hand, I think the bill enlarges certain rights unnecessarily and unjustly.

In the first place, I think the first section, in referring to incomplete Spanish or Mexican grants, is liable to great misconstruction. I listened with interest to the definition which the Senator from Delaware gave of the difference between a complete and an incomplete grant. The very fact that it required such labored argument to establish the distinction which exists in his mind and which must be enforced by the court should, I think, call for the greatest caution. I am enforced in my objection to that phrase of nomenclature or definition by a reference to the act of Congress which provided for the settlement of grants of a similar character arising under the same treaty in the State of California. There the commission was required to examine and pass upon every right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government. It was not limited necessarily to a grant; it was not limited to an incomplete title nor to a complete title; but it simply took those people with reference to all their rights and required them to be adjudicated upon by the commission and a determination reached in accordance with the law and the facts in each particular case.

I therefore think that if the bill is to be passed, this limitation of the authority of the court to pass upon an incomplete title ought to be stricken out, and that all the rights of all the citizens of New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada under the treaty should be passed upon by this commission.

I am the more enforced in my judgment of that by the fact that there are a large class of people in New Mexico who if this provision is to be adopted will be cut out of their rights entirely. There are located in the valley of the Rio Grande, and more particularly in the neighborhood of the city of Albuquerque, quite a large number of people who are living upon small tracts of land running probably all the way from five acres to forty acres in extent, limited and varying in width upon the Rio Grande River, and extending back across the bottom and on to the mesa, giving tillable land and pasture land of irregular shape, conformed to no theory of survey, forming an aliquot part of no quarter-section of land or section of land, as we know it under our system of surveying land. These people do not hold there by reason of a grant in the ordinary sense of the term nor in the sense in which that term is used in the bill. They and their ancestors have lived upon those tracts of land, some of them as long as two hundred years without changing possession or location. Others of them have been in possession as long as one hundred years, and none of them perhaps for less than fifty years. Those people under this bill would absolutely be cut out of all title whatever to their possessions.

I have examined section 10 of the bill, which it was supposed by some might cover this class of cases, but upon a reference to it you will find that it is entirely inadequate, because it is limited to those who have grants, and these people have no grants. They were placed in possession, according to tradition, by the commanding officer of the post or fort or presidio, as it was called in the time of it, where they became not only the sources of supply for the food necessary to maintain the post, but also its means of defense against their enemies. Under the law of Mexico it was not necessary, nor even desirable, that they should ever have a paper title. Their possession had been recognized by the successive governments over them; they were in the actual and manual possession of those lands, and no one was likely to ever dispossess them. They have been protected since we acquired New Mexico simply by the order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has directed that no entry should be permitted to be made of those lands. I have in my hand now a copy of a dispatch sent by the Commissioner of the General Land Office within a few days to the register and receiver of the land office at Santa Fé, N. Mex., answering an inquiry as to whether entries could be made within the sections in which those locations are, saying to the register and receiver that entries shall not be made unless the parties affirmatively prove that the lands they seek to enter are not in possession of anybody else.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PLUMB. I do.

Mr. MAXEY. I want to understand this thing. Suppose a party filed a petition for a grant, a survey had been ordered and actually made, and the party put in possession. He is put in actual possession of the land under marked bounds, but the final grant or concession has not been issued. Does the bill propose to cut out all the excess within that marked boundary where the actual possession has been delivered according to the Mexican law and turn it over to the United States? Is that the proposition?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly not.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly not. The Senator has explained that, I think, fully.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I did not understand the question of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. I will repeat my question. The Senator doubtless is perfectly aware of the various steps taken to secure a Spanish grant. Suppose that a party seeking title has filed his petition, an order of survey has been granted by the proper authority, the survey actually made, and the possession as required by the law delivered to the applicant, and he placed in the actual possession of the land; and it turns out that it being an eleven-league grant, there is more to the out-boundary mark, as the law requires, containing more than eleven leagues, does the bill propose to cut out all the rest over eleven leagues?

Mr. PLUMB. I certainly understand it that way. If that is not the case, then I have not only misunderstood the bill, but I have misunderstood the entire tenor of this discussion.

Mr. MAXEY. That is what I should like to have understood. It will control my vote on the matter.

Mr. PLUMB. And I can give cases where that is entirely proper and should be done.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to say that if that is the case, I certainly shall not vote for any bill that embraces such a clause as that.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish merely to dispose of one thing at a time. The Senator from Kansas was speaking of one thing and my friend from Texas I think was speaking of another. If the case he has described is true accurately, that the man has had the juridical possession of the land delivered to him under the law of Mexico, what more does he need? The laws of the United States and the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo say that his title is perfect, and the courts of the United States will maintain it. He is not the man to come under this proposed law. He has no need for it. His title is just as good under those facts as any title in the District of Columbia or elsewhere. We are speaking entirely of an incomplete title; and although possibly to the fatigue of my friend my argument on that subject was "labored," it was drawn forth not by my own suggestion but by the question of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] now in the chair. I endeavored to answer him in order to leave nothing unexplained in the bill that it was thought worth while to reach by it.

Mr. PLUMB. I made use of an infelicitous term in speaking of the argument of the Senator from Delaware. I meant to say that the argument was lengthy rather than "labored." It only illustrated, as I think, the difficulty of arriving at a conclusion which should be satisfactory as to exactly what class of cases are embraced in the bill. Take the case the Senator has himself suggested, a case where the claimant under the law of Mexico has had delivered to him the juridical possession. The Senator says in that case there is a complete grant; but suppose it turns out at some time that there is a failure to prove it?

Mr. MAXEY. The very case that I put was where the final concession had not been made, but the equities were complete. The party had made his petition in due form of law, was placed in the actual possession upon an actual survey, and has possession, but the final concession or grant, as they call it, is not made. Then the party, having nothing further to do himself, but the government not having issued the grant to him, he has not, of course, a legal title; he has an equitable title. Now, can that surplus or excess be taken from him? That is what I want to know.

Mr. PLUMB. That is part of the purpose I have now in view in regard to my objections to the bill. But taking the case which the Senator from Delaware has suggested, where the grant, as he says, is complete, the evidence of the juridical possession and of the boundary is not of record anywhere, or, at least, it may not be. It is a fact within the knowledge of somebody, which can be proven in a court. That proof is made matter of record, and based upon that proof a paper title may be issued. But suppose a person relies upon the fact that he has got the complete title within the definition of the Senator from Delaware, and does not come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of proving his title, and some other time, an action of ejectment being pending in regard to this particular piece of property, he fails to make proof satisfactory, then he has got an incomplete title, although before he supposed he had a complete title. It will be necessary for everybody who has any title whatever to any of the lands in New Mexico not confirmed by an act of Congress to come into this court and prove his title, and unless the muniment of title shall be in the court, or as a result of its judgment, he never will be safe. Consequently this limitation to incomplete titles is calculated to make confusion and to work great injustice.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to interrupt him for a moment on that point?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think if the Senator from Kansas would look at the act of Congress approved May 26, 1824, for the settlement of the outstanding land grants in Missouri and in Arkansas he would find that this bill is a substantial copy of that. All the angry and long controversies in both those States were settled, as I understand, under the provisions of that act, the language of which is almost in the very words of the measure now under consideration by the Senate on the particular points to which the Senator refers. That act has been in existence for more than half a century, a large number of claims were settled under it, and I never heard of any great injury having been worked by it. The act of 1824 provides—

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, or their legal representatives, claiming lands, tenements, or hereditaments in that part of the late province of Louisiana which is now included within the State of Missouri, by virtue of any French or Spanish grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey, legally made, granted, or issued, before the 10th day of March, 1804, by the proper authorities, to any person or persons resident in the province of Louisiana at the date thereof, or on or before the 10th day of March, 1804, and which was protected or secured by the treaty between the United States of America and the French Republic of the 30th day of April, 1803, and which might have been perfected into a complete title under and in conformity to the laws, usages, and customs of the government under which the same originated had not the sovereignty of the country been transferred to the United States in each and every such case," &c.

That is the celebrated Missouri act of 1824, under which the titles to land in that State were settled.

Mr. PLUMB. The circumstances are entirely different. At that time there was no demand for land; there was no controversy about land; and there was hardly anything anywhere to excite even the acquisitive faculty of anybody. Whatever a man claimed he took, whatever he wanted he got, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] well says. We are now at a trying period of the history of this country, when land is worth something, when there is a controversy about land everywhere, and when men will need to be on their guard more fully, and particularly in reference to their titles, than they ever were before. In addition to that, the jurisdiction from which we got the land is different. There was never such a lax land law known among men as that which prevailed in the Mexican Government, so far as it related to the actual possession of title, by the issuance of a piece of paper from the general government to the claimant.

The class of people of which I have spoken would, as I have said, absolutely be put out of the possession of their holdings under the operation of this bill. They have no grant, they have no warrant, they have no survey in the meaning of the bill. They are a class of people who by reason of their poverty, by reason of their general helplessness, and by reason of the fact that they have dwelt upon this land for generations, are entitled specifically to our sympathy and to our most careful support. Even if it were possible to enlarge this bill so as to embrace them, still its provisions would be confiscation to them. Every one seeking to acquire a title to a piece of land under this bill is required to file his petition setting up at great length his claim of title or claim to title. He has got to prove that in a court. An appeal is bound to be taken against him, because if the decision is in his favor the district attorney is instructed to appeal to the supreme court of the Territory. One of these persons owning only from ten to forty acres of land (the highest holding any of them have) would find not only all he has wiped out in the payment of lawyers' fees, but a mortgage put upon his entire future. That is the treatment we propose to mete out to those people who became citizens of the United States by no will of their own, and whom we contracted to protect in all the rights which they had under the laws of Mexico. We have no right, I submit, to impose upon them this expensive proceeding, nor any expensive proceeding, for the purpose of enabling them to acquire title to the land which Mexico would have given them and had given them practically without cost.

I think the bill is somewhat liberal in some respects. Section 9 provides for issuing scrip to make up the lack which the court shall find in any man's grant. The familiar form of making these grants was to name certain exterior boundaries within which the selection of the particular amount of land granted was to be made. Sometimes, as in the case of the Maxwell grant, the exterior boundaries embraced seven, eight, ten, perhaps even twenty times the amount of land that was granted. Judicial possession was given, that is to say, a man was put in possession of a particular piece of land, which became a corner-stone perhaps, or at all events a place from which the boundary of his possession was to be determined. It was one of the points; all the rest of them were floating; the lines could be carried in any direction and in all directions within the exterior limits named in his grant. A familiar illustration of that was the Mariposa case, in which the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed that right as existing in a person holding under the original grantee.

Now, take a case of this kind: A person has a grant we will say for eleven leagues of land. The exterior boundaries are one hundred leagues of land. He has a certain possession all the way, more or less well defined, and also more or less ill defined. It is a matter of no particular consequence, because he has a right to use the adjacent land as pasture land, subject of course to such infringement as may come from the operation of the land laws of the United States, or from some one going upon those lands with the freedom common to Americans, who may more or less trespass upon the limited area so held within the greater area. When the court comes to find out what the boundaries of the tract of A B are within these exterior boundaries, it finds a certain possession. He ought to have the right to go in a certain direction, but in the mean time some one, perhaps with the consent of the grantee himself, has settled upon that under the land laws of the United States and has cut off in that particular direction a quarter-section, or a section, or ten or one hundred sections of the grant. The party is not then constrained to go somewhere else within the exterior limits and get his land, but he may stop right there and say, "So much has been taken off from the land which I was put in possession of within these exterior limits, and instead of taking other land just as good perhaps and adjoining within these large boundaries, I will take scrip, which I can locate upon the fattest land in the Territory of New Mexico or Arizona or in the State of Colorado." One acre cut off in that way and located under that provision would probably be worth any ten or perhaps any fifty acres within the original grant. It is the most dangerous power that could possibly be conferred upon a court. It would not operate in favor of all those people, but only of a few. It would open up a wide domain for speculation in the public lands of the United States, which although not intended would inevitably ensue.

I think with reference to indemnity that Congress ought to leave itself in a condition to pass upon each particular case to be reported by the court, if its report shall ever be made. If this provision for indemnity is not in the bill, my belief is that all those people will get sometime, if they ever get judgment at all, all the land they are entitled to.

But one of the fundamental objections to the bill is the tribunal. These cases are to be tried by the United States courts in the Territories and in the States within which the grants are situated. Every one familiar with the condition of things existing in New Mexico (and that is the Territory within which most of these grants lie) knows that the courts of that Territory are overburdened now with their current and ordinary business. It is almost impossible now to get prompt trial for any case, civil or criminal, pending in those courts. You burden those courts now with the adjustment of these land grants of great value and of great number, hotly contested as some of them will be, and as all of them are bound to be in point of fact, because that obligation is placed upon the district attorney, and it will be years, it will be a generation in the ordinary course of things, before the cases are settled. In addition to that, after they are settled in the court of the district, the district attorney is compelled to appeal to the supreme court of the Territory, and after the supreme court of the Territory has passed upon the case it still remains to be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. The generation of men who are legislating or seeking to legislate upon this subject will never witness the adjustment and perfection of these grants under this bill.

I have before me the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico for the year 1879, a man thoroughly versed in all the surroundings and belongings of these land grants in the Territory of New Mexico. I ask the Chief Clerk to read so much of his report as I have marked for the purpose of showing many of the difficulties which the courts of the Territory will have in settling the cases if this bill should become a law.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Judging from the light of experience, I am of the opinion that a reference of these cases for adjudication to the district courts of the respective districts in which the lands may be situated would not be advisable, and while there are some arguments in favor of such a reference, I believe the results would not be as satisfactory as under the present system.

Some of the objections to that method are, that the court of adjudication should have direct and ready access to all the archives, it being frequently necessary, on account of the antiquity of the title papers, to introduce for purposes of comparison other original documents bearing the signatures of the same Spanish or Mexican officials whose signatures, or purported signatures, appear on the muniments of title in the case at bar, and the genuineness or ungenuineness of these title papers are frequently necessarily determined by such comparison where there are no living witnesses familiar with the signatures of such officials to prove or disprove the genuinenesss of the same.

The evidence of the abandonment or fraudulent character of a grant may exist among the archives in documents having no direct connection with the case at bar in one district, and the same document may embrace evidence of a similar character, or reverse, in another case pending in another district, and the document may be required in evidence in both district courts at the same time; or its existence may be known to one and unknown to the other, or may be unknown to either, unless direct and easy access to the entire archives can be had by the court. If these documents are sent back and forth from one district to another, or to and from the regular custodian of the same, they would be liable to be lost; and if distributed among the several judicial districts, the evidence of legality or illegality of the documents in some particular case might be on file in another district than the one in which it might be required in evidence in such particular case.

The investigations of this office the past year have demonstrated that some of these alleged grants are forgeries; and a comparison of the signature of the governor on the alleged title papers with the signature of such officer proven and accepted as genuine upon other documents in the archives, and the judgment of experts thereon, is not infrequently required to establish the character of the document under consideration.

Unless the court before which these claims are adjudicated can have access to all of these archives it is much more liable to be imposed upon by fraudulent title papers.

Mr. PLUMB. Reference has been made to abuses that grew out of the administration of the law of 1851 in California.

Mr. BAYARD. The law of the United States?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. The act of March 3, 1851.

Mr. PLUMB. California was a long way off. As I said a moment ago, referring to another class of cases, there was abundance of land for everybody; there was no pressure for scrutiny; there was no law providing for any great scrutiny in regard to validity nor in regard to the extent of the grants to be passed upon. In addition to that there was no public sentiment; there was no press, no telegraph, no communication of any kind practically connecting California with this side of the mountains. What was going on over there was regarded as something that was incidental to the acquisition of that territory, not likely to occur anywhere else, and affecting nobody practically but the people who lived in California and who agreed among themselves in regard to what they wanted, and substantially in regard to what they got.

No such abuses could ever arise under the administration of a similar law in New Mexico or in Arizona, but a commission of men appointed with reference to their especial qualifications for this service, to sit at Santa Fé, at Albuquerque, at Mesilla, at Las Cruces, or any other point in the Territory where it should be necessary to examine the record, hear the witness in person, have ample time to scrutinize every single thing relating to these titles, would be the best possible way of adjusting them, and is the way that ought to be adopted. Put them now into the courts, sandwiched between cases of trespass and damage on the one side and criminal causes and causes arising under the mining laws of the United States on the other, and they not only will not be tried, and the unsettled condition of things now existing will continue for a generation or more, but the decisions to be arrived at can not in any case be as complete, as absolutely certain of being just and fair, as they would be if they were tried before a court which had jurisdiction for that purpose and for nothing else. That is what I not only think we ought to do but what I think we are bound in good faith to do. We have waited now for nearly forty years without doing anything practically to settle these vexed questions and give to those people the rights we guaranteed to them under the treaty. We ought now to do it, and to do it in such a way as that the delay which has already occurred will not be supplemented by a delay as great, and added to that the great cost and burden of the expenses that are provided for in the bill, and the constant assertion on the part of the Government of its right to appeal notwithstanding the case may be just as plain as day.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it may be considered presumptuous for me to offer any suggestions in regard to this bill, especially should I take a different view of its provisions from that entertained by the honorable Senator who has just preceded me; but I have become interested during the discussion upon the bill, and I desire to submit a few suggestions of my own.

I presume there is no difference of opinion in this body, at least there ought to be none, as to the duty of the United States to provide in some manner for the confirmation of land claims and grants under the authority of the Spanish and Mexican Governments which were made prior to February 2, 1848, the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, in the now Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, and Utah, and the States of Nevada and Colorado; nor should there be any difference of opinion as to whether the time has now arrived when provision for the confirmation of these claims should be made. The treaty was executed in 1848, and after the lapse of all the time which has intervened down to the present day these claims in the State of California are not yet entirely disposed of, and scarcely a beginning has been made as to the confirmation of these claims in the States and Territories mentioned in this bill. Notwithstanding the matter has been frequently called to the attention of Congress by the Chief Executive of the nation and by the Secretary of the Interior and by other officers of the Interior Department, Congress as yet has made no adequate provision for the confirmation of these claims.

In 1854 a law was passed providing for the examination of claims by the surveyor-general of New Mexico, but confessedly that law has been a failure; it has amounted to a denial of justice. After twenty-six years a thousand claims had been presented to the surveyor-general, and only about one hundred and fifty, it appears, had been reported for confirmation, and only seventy-one of that number had been confirmed by Congress. Under the act of 1854 the surveyor-general of New Mexico received elaborate instructions from the Interior Department in regard to his proceedings in securing the documentary testimony in regard to these grants and private claims and in regard to his course of procedure in executing that law.

As to the character of the testimony upon which the rights of these private claimants depend, I desire to read from a communication from the surveyor-general of New Mexico to the Interior Department, dated September 30, 1855:

> In accordance with your instructions I made application to his excellency David Merriwether, governor of the Territory, for such of the archives as related to grants of land by the former authorities of the country, which he declined delivering, giving as his reason that their selection from the large amount of papers composing the public archives of the Territory would involve an immense amount of labor and a heavy expenditure, which he was not authorized to incur. He, however, allowed me to remove the packages containing such papers as related to the grants of land in the country from their deposit, and examine them in my own office; whereupon I immediately assigned two of my clerks to separate them. On the last day of July this difficult duty was accomplished, and from one hundred and sixty-eight packages, averaging one hundred and sixty-eight thousand papers, of every nature and description imaginable, one thousand seven hundred and fifteen grants, conveyances of land, and other documents referring to claims to lands, have been selected, and are now being arranged and classified in a systematical form in this office. It will, however, be impossible to have them properly and substantially bound, as required by your instructions, on account of the different shapes and forms in which they are to be found—some existing on large sheets of foolscap paper, while others are to be found on half sheets, and others again on scraps of paper, which can never be bound in any convenient form.

This is the statement of the condition of the documentary evidence relating to these claims.

Again, we have just heard read an extract from a report or communication from the surveyor-general of New Mexico, in which he states, as I understood a reading of the document, that it has lately been found that a large number of the documents on which the rights of these claimants are based are forged.

Now there are presented to this body two measures for settling these claims, which involve a hearing of the testimony, an examination of the documentary evidence, a judicial decision, a segregation of these private claims from the great body of the public land, and a survey of them; in other words a determination as to their validity and their extent, and the final confirmation of them by a judicial tribunal.

One plan proposed is the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and while I will say that I do not know that it is the best plan which can be devised, I unhesitatingly declare, from what information I have on the subject, that it is the best plan which ever has been devised by the Congress of the United States to inquire into the validity and extent and to confirm these claims, and, with one or two exceptions, it meets with my hearty approval. Objection has been made to it on the ground that it provides for the issuing of scrip. This objection is not well founded. Prior to 1860, and possibly prior to 1862, it was the policy of the Government as the general surveys were extended over the public domain to offer the lands at public sale. These public sales were continued during a length of time regulated by law. At the expiration of the time alloted for the public sales, if the lands had not been sold, they became offered lands, and any citizen of the United States could thereafter enter any amount of those lands he chose at private entry, paying therefor $1.25 an acre and receive his patent at once. With the passage of the homestead bill in 1862, if not previously, the policy of the Government changed, and since that time there has been no such thing as offering lands at public sale. The policy of the Government has been to reserve the public lands for homesteads—for homes for actual settlers, and to-day the offered lands of the United States are comparatively worthless; they are lands which would not sell at private sale or at public auction; they are lands which for a quarter of a century have gone begging for a purchaser at a dollar and a quarter an acre. These are the lands known as lands subject to private entry; and to these lands is the location of the scrip authorized by this act limited. I think that the Government would be doing well and getting the best of the bargain if it had granted away lands which belonged to these private claimants and could account for them with this character of scrip that could only be located on these detached and isolated portions of the public domain which are subject to private entry.

Another objection has been made against the provision of this bill which authorizes testimony which has been taken before a surveyor-general to be used in contests before the courts in cases where the witnesses are dead. It is suggested that the provision ought to be broader and require all this testimony to be received. I am not prepared to say that such a provision would do great harm, because the testimony is not made conclusive on the courts by the provisions of the bill. The provision of the bill is substantially that the court may give it such weight as it is entitled to. It may be ex parte testimony, and it would be an injustice to people who may be claiming these lands under the laws of the United States and have a standing under the provisions of this bill, to object to the confirmation of these private land claims granted under the laws of Spain and Mexico and who may become parties to the litigation, to allow all the testimony which has been taken in the proceeding before the surveyor-general to be read in evidence and to be considered in a controversy between such parties claiming under the laws of the United States and the claimants under the Spanish and Mexican grants.

There are, however, some provisions in this bill which I think are injudicious; for instance, the provision by which these suits are to be instituted and tried in accordance with the laws governing suits in equity before the district court. I apprehend that that provision has been borrowed from some previous act. In the discussion of the bill to provide a civil government for Alaska the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] asked me what civil jurisdiction the district courts had. I suggested then that they had original jurisdiction in cases in admiralty, but they have other civil jurisdiction; by various statutes jurisdiction in particular cases has been conferred upon them until the list of matters in which they have civil jurisdiction has become quite lengthy. They did have jurisdiction in equity of certain matters growing out of the bankrupt law and the internal-revenue laws. I concede that there is no great objection to conferring this jurisdiction on the district courts; but is there a necessity for it? I believe not. Since 1867 the judges of the district courts may hold circuit courts. By the provisions of an act passed in 1867 circuit courts may be held by the justice of the Supreme Court who is assigned to the circuit, by the circuit judge, and by the district judge, or any two of them. Therefore there is no reason now for allowing these proceedings to be instituted in the district court in a State. I think it would be far better to have the bill amended so that these suits should be commenced in the circuit court, which may be held and is held by the district judge, and then the appeal will be directly from that court to the Supreme Court of the United States if the case is appealed. But an attempt is made in this bill to authorize an appeal directly from the district court over the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The other provision to which I refer is a provision that the costs of survey required to be paid by the claimant shall be a lien on the land. It is an unusual proceeding, it seems to me, to make a lien upon land and provide for the sale of the land for the lien without providing any tribunal to determine the amount, without providing any record upon which the lien is to be recorded, and without making any provision as to the proceedings by which the land is to be sold for the lien. I think it would be a sufficient security of the right of the United States to strike out that provision and leave the section to read that a patent shall not be issued until one-half the cost of survey has been paid.

I said I believed this was a good bill. Why do I believe so? The gentleman who preceded me, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], suggested that it would be many years—I cannot recall his exact language—before these controversies would be determined in these courts, and this bill provides for at least fourteen distinct tribunals in which these proceedings may be instituted. There are three judges, a chief-justice, and two associate justices in each of the four Territories, and a judge of the district court in each of the States. Therefore, as I said before, we have here in this bill provided fourteen distinct tribunals; and more than that, they are convenient to the litigants—they are domestic tribunals.

Again, this bill refers all these controversies to the established courts of the United States, to a part of the judicial system now existing with all its machinery for entertaining, hearing, examining, and determining these controversies, with its clerks, with its marshals, with its records, with its offices where these records may be preserved and safely kept, convenient at all times for the examination of the parties interested in them. Besides that, it provides for the original papers being preserved in this record. With such a provision, with so many distinct tribunals having jurisdiction over separate districts of this territory, it is possible, it is highly probable, that the three years' limit provided by this act will be a sufficient time to enable all these proceedings to be commenced, and in the due course of judicial proceedings all the controversies will be satisfactorily determined.

Now let us examine for a moment the other plan proposed, an itinerant commission consisting of three persons, with a clerk, stenographer, and other attachés, who are to travel over two entire States and four Territories to hear and investigate and determine controversies which have arisen or may arise in regard to these private land claims. I ask the Senator from Kansas, if it would take the time which he states to have these controversies determined in fourteen different courts already constituted and upon which jurisdiction is conferred by this bill, how long would it take this traveling commission to determine them?

More than that, Mr. President, it is provided in the proposed substitute that the testimony in regard to the original and present possession and occupation of the land claimed and boundaries and limits shall be taken upon or in the vicinity of the land. Just think of it! A commission traveling over this vast extent of territory, not locating themselves at convenient points within the district, but traveling about and receiving the testimony in the vicinity of each private land claim! If the provisions of the bill offered by the committee could be characterized as infamous, I should like to ask the Senator who proposes the substitute what epithet we could apply to the substitute which would fitly characterize it?

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another provision of this proposed substitute. Section 5 provides—

That the commissioners shall give due and public notice of the time and place for filing claims and of holding their sessions in each State and Territory.

I should like to inquire of the Senator offering the substitute what is "due notice?" If it applied to any existing law, if this provision was to be enacted in regard to the existing laws of the United States and this commission were to proceed in conformity to the laws and rules of practice which govern the courts of the United States, we should know what "due notice" is; but as it is, it is left entirely to the discretion of the commission. It may be a handbill, it may be a public proclamation, it may be a publication in a newspaper; and this is the "notice" which is to be given not only to the holders of these private claims, but to parties who may claim the land adversely to them under the laws of the United States.

There is another provision in the proposed substitute which I desire to call to the attention of the Senate. It is found in section 12, which provides—

That the commissioners shall have the power and authority, upon the hearing, proofs, and examination of claims as provided in this act, to determine conclusively all questions of fact arising in said cases, and to finally decide upon the validity of the title under the grant or claim.

Why, sir, I undertake to say that there never has been in the history of the jurisprudence of this country such a law as is proposed by this substitute granting to a commission of three persons the power to conclusively decide all questions of fact which may arise in regard to these numerous and valuable claims. To be sure there is a provision here for a writ of error, but the whole substitute shows conclusively that upon an appeal or upon the taking of a writ of error nothing but errors of law can be reviewed. If this bill had not been introduced by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], I should have supposed that it had been drawn by some person who wished to get on the commission and to hold the extraordinary power in this great extent of country consisting of two States and four Territories—the power of deciding conclusively all questions of fact relating to these claims.

The United States have had some experience under a law somewhat similar, though more guarded in its provisions than that proposed by the substitute. In pursuance of the provisions contained in the eighth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the Congress of the United States passed an act approved March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California," which provided for the appointment of a commission composed of three persons, to continue for three years, with a secretary qualified to act as interpreter, and necessary clerks, and a law agent to represent the United States. I will not follow the history of the legislation which followed. Suffice it to say that within the period of twenty years there were something like twenty different acts of Congress passed in relation to these claims, extending the time in which the claim might be presented, providing additional remedies to the claimants under the treaty, and to-day, after the lapse, as was said, of nearly forty years, these claims have not been disposed of.

But that is not all. I desire, for the information of the Senate, to read briefly from a report submitted by Attorney-General Black to the President of the United States May 22, 1860:

Under the act of 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, eight hundred and three claims, comprehending nineteen thousand one hundred and forty-eight square miles of territory, were presented to the board of land commissioners, and nearly all of them were confirmed either by the board or by the district courts to which they were appealed.

A very large portion of the best mineral and agricultural region in California, the ports, commercial points, sites for fortifications, light-houses, and other national purposes, were covered by Mexican grants, real or fabricated. In all the territory conquered or purchased from Mexico there seemed to be not an island or place for a fort, a custom-house, hospital, or post-office but must be purchased upon his own terms from some private claimant, under a pretended title from Alvarado, Micheltorena, or Pio Pico. It was incredible that such grants could have been made in good faith by any government. But they were supported by such an array of testimony from Mexican officials and other witnesses as to render defense hopeless, unless by some vigorous means thorough investigation could be had and proof obtained that would demonstrate the fraud.

Under the last administration a large appropriation had been made for the purpose of examining records in the city of Mexico. That examination led to the conclusion that even the archives of that government had in some way become an instrument of sanctioning frauds against the United States. Documents of title were produced from the official depositories of the supreme government supporting a claim by a French adventurer upon a large part of the city of San Francisco, Fort Point, the islands of Alcatraz, Farallones, and Point Tiburon, on which the fortifications and light-houses of the United States were being erected. These documents bore the signatures of a former Mexican governor and a Mexican secretary of state; they were sworn to be genuine by a high Mexican official, once a member of their Congress, who, with the permission of his own government, at the instance of the French minister, had left his public duties in Mexico to go to San Francisco and bear witness to the validity of this claim. It was vouched, moreover, by letters from the president of the republic to the governor of California and to the board of land commissioners. But notwithstanding all this, the title papers were then believed and afterwards clearly proved to be mere forgeries. Under these circumstances it was resolved by the President to employ competent legal counsel to go to California and prepare a just defense against the case of Limantour and other land claims pending there, and to provide him with adequate means for a thorough investigation of them.

In the month of February, 1858, Mr. Stanton was employed and sent to San Francisco under instructions, a copy whereof is hereto annexed, marked A. Mr. Stanton immediately departed for California, and was engaged there for nearly a year, and until the final decision of the Limantour case by the district court in favor of the United States. He was accompanied by Lieutenant Harrison, of the Navy, and Mr. James Buchanan, jr., who were employed under his direction.

A portion only of the archives of the Mexican Government had been placed in the custody of the surveyor-general. There had been no collation or translation of them, and many of the most important were scattered over the State, some in the custody of unauthorized officers, some in the possession of individuals, and others in boxes which nobody guarded, and which had never been opened.

Something like the state of affairs that was found to exist in New Mexico when the first surveyor-general of that Territory undertook to look up the testimony relating to these claims.

Their value to the United States, as evidence in these land cases, was almost wholly unknown. Under directions given from the Interior Department, backed by a penal act of Congress soon afterward passed at the instance of this office, they were collected in the different towns and pueblos, wherever they could be found, from Sacramento to San Diego. They were carefully collated and bound, and they now number about four hundred large folio volumes. The most important documents were accurately translated and printed. A large volume of photographic copies of official correspondence, official seals, and fraudulent grants were made and bound together for the use of the courts and the Department. The necessary appropriations to do this work were asked for and explained in the letters hereto annexed, marked B, C, and D.

The archives thus collected furnish irresistible proof that there had been an organized system of fabricating land titles carried on for a long time in California by Mexican officials; that forgery and perjury had been reduced to a regular occupation; that the making of false grants, with the subornation of false witnesses to prove them, had become a trade and a business. Desolate islands, barren rocks, and projecting promontories, useless to individuals, but of priceless value to the Government, had been seized upon under these spurious titles, with a view of extorting millions from the United States for sites necessary to defend the national possessions on the Pacific and to light and guard the commerce of the coast. The richest part of San Francisco was found to be covered by no less than five different grants, every one of them forged after the conquest; Sacramento, Marysville, Stockton, and Petaluma were claimed on titles no better.

I have read this extract from the report of Attorney-General Black to show the condition in which these titles were found to be in California. I am justified in saying, after the extract from the report of the surveyor-general of Mexico read by the Senator from Kansas, that something like the same condition of affairs exists in New Mexico. I therefore say it would be extremely unwise to appoint a commission of three persons and require them to examine all these private land claims in two States and four Territories, and to give them the power to determine conclusively questions of fact and send them out to make the necessary confirmation of these claims by the United States.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Kansas that the bill reported by the committee would work an injustice to certain claimants of lands he has mentioned, but so far as I can understand and from what he has said those claimants have no standing whatever under the treaties between the United States and Mexico. They do not derive their right or title to the land occupied by them, whatever it may be, under these treaties. Their right to the land appears to be a mere right of possession, or possibly a mere possession. If they have acquired any title to the lands which are in their possession it has been by prescription, by the running of the statute of limitation; and the general rule is that statutes of limitation do not run against the Government. If they are to be protected in the possession and in the title to the lands they occupy it must be under some additional legislation by Congress.

There can be no general act passed that will not work injustice in some cases, and in view of what we know of the history of these claims I suggest that the provision for the appeal of these cases from the district court of the Territory to the supreme court of the Territory and from the supreme court of the Territory and the district court in the States to the Supreme Court of the United States, with the right of the Supreme Court on appeal to examine into questions of fact and determine whether or not these claims are just claims and making the appellate court the final tribunal to determine whether patents shall issue, is a just provision, is a judicious provision, and while it may work injustice in the cases of squatters mentioned by the Senator from Kansas, as I said before, there can be no general law by which a large number of private rights are to be settled but what will be found to work some injustice to some particular individual.

I think, therefore, in view of this whole matter, that the bill reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims will be found to be effective; will be found to be so guarded that both the rights of the United States and of all claimants of these lands will be fairly and equitably adjusted; that it will be economical, because it refers these controversies to the existing courts of the country.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Beck,	George,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Butler,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Camden,	Hampton,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Fair,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Vance,
Garland,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Vest.

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Conger,	Manderson,	Pendleton,
Bayard,	Frye,	Maxey,	Pike,
Blair,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Call,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned to Monday, February 4.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The SPEAKER. Before the Journal is approved the Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that on yesterday the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill (H. R. 566) for the relief of Rebecca Burch, widow of a soldier of the Revolution, and asked that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Pensions. An examination of the Journal shows that the bill was not referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but was referred in the first instance to the Committee on Pensions. If there be no objection, therefore, that part of the Journal which records the proceeding referred to will be omitted, as it was entirely unnecessary; and with that omission the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as read will be approved.

There being no objection, the remainder of the Journal as read was approved.

KANSAS RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back with a favorable recommendation the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, there was granted to the State of Kansas for the purpose of aiding in the construction—

First. Of a railroad and telegraph from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence, and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, to the southern line of the State in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River, to the point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad where said road intersects the Neosho River.

Second. Of a railroad from the city of Atchison, via Topeka, the capital of said State, to the western line of the State in the direction of Fort Union and Santa Fé, N. Mex., with a branch from the point where this last-named road crosses the Neosho, down said Neosho Valley to the point where the said first-named road enters the said Neosho Valley, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said roads and each of its branches; and

Whereas it was provided by said act as follows: "That if any part of said roads and branches is not completed within ten years from the passage of this act, no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States;" and

Whereas it is alleged that the whole of said roads and branches were not completed within ten years from the passage of said act, to wit, that the road from the city of Leavenworth to the town of Lawrence, the branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River to the Neosho, and the branch from where the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road crosses the Neosho, down said Neosho Valley to the point where the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston road enters said valley, have never been constructed; and

Whereas it is alleged that the Secretary of the Interior, on or about October 6, 1883, certified to the State of Kansas a list of about 189,384 acres for the benefit of the said Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to immediately inform the House of Representatives whether or not the roads and branches above mentioned were completed within ten years from the passage of said act; and if not so completed, by what authority or under what law the list of lands above specified were certified to said State as aforesaid.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION FOR DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. ELLIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians with Senate amendments, and further to ask that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 29, 1884.

Resolved, That the joint resolution of the House of Representatives (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians do pass with the following amendments:

In line 1, strike out "50" and insert "100."

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following:

"And that out of this appropriation the sum of not exceeding $5,000 be expended for telegraphing and making purchases of such supplies, including cost of advertising."

Amend the title so that it will read: "Joint resolution appropriating $100,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians."

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Appropriations, which is that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think the House should concur in the amendment increasing the amount to $100,000. I believe it is necessary.

I was a member of the commission that visited those Indians last summer. We found them in a very destitute condition. They are in a section of the country which was originally a fine buffalo country, but the game has all gone. The time has come when these Indians must turn themselves to agriculture to make a living. They are anxious to yield up portions of their vast but now useless hunting-grounds, and only ask such temporary support as will enable them to become self-supporting. Visiting them in company with Senator VEST, we found them in such destitute condition that unless the Government did something for them they certainly would starve during this winter. We did not have authority to pledge the Government to furnish them with food, but we did give them the assurance that we would personally do everything in our power to get Congress to pass an appropriation in order that they might be kept from starvation.

Mr. ELLIS. The House committee gave every dollar recommended by the Department of the Interior. All of the reports upon which this request for aid was based were before that Department and before us. We presumed that the Department of the Government having special charge of this matter knew what was required; and we based our action upon those reports and upon the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Interior and gave every single dollar that was asked for.

The debate in the Senate does not develop the reasons which guided that body in its action. No report from the Senate accompanies the House resolution, and we are in the dark as to the reasons which governed their action.

The second amendment we deem is entirely useless. There is an appropriation made for telegraphing and for correspondence, and for commissions for purchasing these supplies, which is unauthorized and unwarranted by the general statutes. It is presumed, I suppose, that the supplies purchased by this appropriation must be advertised in the usual manner. In the case of an emergency such as this authority is given under the general statute for the Secretary to purchase in open market.

Mr. CHACE. My recollection is that the Secretary recommended an appropriation for this purpose of $137,000.

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir.

Mr. CHACE. I have not the report before me.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think if the gentleman from Louisiana will look at the estimates he will find the Secretary recommended $50,000 for the Crow tribe alone, $25,000 for the Blackfeet Indians, $25,000 for the tribes at the Belknap agency, and some additional sums, of which I have not the exact figures, for the tribes at Fort Peck.

Mr. ELLIS. The estimates reached us in a special communication from the Department of the Interior, which, if the gentleman will allow me, I will send for to the committee-room and get.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Under a resolution of the Senate a joint commission was appointed to visit those Indians, among others, last summer. On the part of the Senate it consisted of Senator DAWES, Senator CAMERON of Wisconsin, Senator LOGAN, Senator MORGAN, and Senator VEST; and on the part of the House the members were our late lamented friend and colleague Mr. HASKELL and myself. We traveled over a large portion of the territory occupied by the Sioux tribes, and also the country of the Indians provided for in this bill. The inspection of the northern tribes was assigned to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and myself as a subcommittee. We found those Indians in the most lamentable state of destitution. Up to within a few years ago these Indians had never been necessitated to make any demand upon the Government. They lived upon that portion of the plains which was known as the buffalo country. Their subsistence, their clothing, their lodges, were all made from the products of that animal; and from the sales of surplus robes, beyond their own necessities, they obtained large amounts of money. Individually each of these Indians was enabled to make more money per day by hunting these wild cattle of the plains known as the buffalo and by trapping for furs than the average mechanic or laboring man was enabled to earn in the pursuits of the whites. They were therefore independent of the Government.

But so great has been the devastation by hunters and others of that valuable animal the buffalo, that it has now almost entirely disappeared. These Indians, who have never been trained to agriculture, who are without farms or means of support, now find the buffalo all gone, and the whole country destitute of game. In order to give the House an idea of the condition of affairs there, I will state that eleven years ago I traveled over that country when it seemed to me that the buffaloes were as thick as the stars in the sky, that they were practically inexhaustible. The plains were black with them, yet during the past summer Mr. VEST and myself traveled over 400 miles in that country and all the game we saw was one antelope and two coyotes, and this desolation was in a region which was formerly so overrun by the buffalo as to be designated on all the old maps as the "buffalo country." The destruction of that animal is the occasion of the necessity which confronts the House to-day. We found that the Indians there would surely starve this winter unless some provision was made for them. While, as I have said, we had no authority to pledge the Government to any particular action in the way of supplying their wants, as there was no treaty with these Indians under which we are bound to issue rations, but in reply to the entreaties of these suffering people we voluntarily pledged ourselves to do the best we could to obtain such action on the part of the Houses of Congress as would prevent their starving this winter.

I have no doubt that the members of that commission in the Senate, when this resolution was sent to that body—in fact, I was so told yesterday by Senator VEST—went before the Committee on Appropriations and made such representations as led to increasing the amount contained in the joint resolution of the House. I am very sure that is the way the increase came to be made.

Now, while I have no objection to having this matter go to a conference committee in order that my honorable friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], who I know intends to be kindly and liberal in this matter, shall have all the information possible upon the subject, still I think the House should concur in the action of the Senate as soon as possible.

These Indians are very desirous of being placed upon such portions of their immense and useless hunting-grounds as may be necessary to support them by farming and stock-raising and to surrender the remainder to the United States, asking in return that such assistance may be given them as will enable them to become farmers and stock-raisers, and that until they can themselves produce something. We found them very reasonable and sensible in view of the changed condition of affairs, and I ask leave to insert some of their utterances in the conferences we held with them:

Big Nose, chief of the Piegans, said:

Since Governor I. I. Stevens came here, this is the first time the Government has done me a service; since then there has been nothing but unfulfilled promises. I hope you men (the commission) will carry out your words. What I mean is, that for a while after the Stevens treaty we got plenty, then dwindled down to nothing. This council raises my hopes, but the winter is close. You see how poor we are; there is no buffalo; we are on the verge of starvation. I would like to know if anything will be done this winter. If not, it will be too late for many; they will starve.

Senator VEST said that it would be three months before the Great Council would meet. He would immediately ask that something be done to keep them this winter. Under our laws the Great Council must vote money before it can be used; but he would make it his business to see that they would be provided with food for the winter. He saw that the buffalo were gone and that something must be done, but he warned them that the buffalo would not come back with the spring; the game was gone forever. It had been destroyed, and the Government will now give you plows and reapers and hoes, will break up some ground for each family, and help to build a house, and when they will take care of them give some cattle to replace the buffalo, and we will do all we can to help you make a living for yourselves. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!" from the chiefs and Indians.]

In the report of the subcommittee in regard to the Gros Ventres and Assinaboines at Fort Belknap had the honor to concur with Senator VEST in this statement:

We found the condition of these Indians most deplorable. They have heretofore lived chiefly by the chase, but the game has now disappeared, and as they are entirely ignorant of agriculture and have no cattle they can only look to the Government for subsistence. Jerry, head chief of the Gros Ventres, stated publicly in the council that one of his tribe was then dying from starvation, and we have no doubt that many of them will perish during the coming winter unless relief is given them. Their reservation is on the line of British America and the winters very severe. Insufficiently clothed, and allowed from three to four pounds of beef to each person for a week, it will be easily seen that unless the rations are increased great suffering, and even death, must ensue. Mr. Lincoln, the agent, stated to us that his supplies for the year amounted to 150,000 pounds of flour and 25,000 pounds of wheat, equal to thirty weeks' rations; 180,000 pounds of beef, in gross, equal to six weeks' rations; 5,000 pounds of bacon and 6,000 pounds of coffee; but sugar, tobacco, and coffee are only issued in pay for work.

We can not think that anything besides the bare statement we have made of the terrible destitution among these unfortunate savages is necessary to secure the prompt action of Congress in giving relief. Justice, humanity, religion, all call upon us as a Christian people to act at once, and to hesitate would be a lasting stain upon our national character.

Mr. RANDALL. It is desirable that this bill with the Senate amendments should go to a conference. The Senate has doubled the amount appropriated by the House, and we have been unable to find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any reason for their doing so. I hope, therefore, that the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations will be adopted by the House.

Mr. KASSON. I suppose that could be done without the conference on the part of the House being considered as instructed absolutely against concurring in the Senate amendments. That is the only point I am anxious about.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not agree in the matter of instructing a committee of conference in the light that perhaps the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] may do. I think the conference should be free and ample.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman knows that the conferees on the part of the House sometimes regard themselve as instructed by the vote of the House to be obstinate in adhering to the action of the House. I think if no information has been furnished the Committee on Appropriations why the amount was increased by the Senate it would be well that the matter should go to a conference. But I want the understanding to be that those of us who dissent from the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations shall not be considered as pledged against concurring in the Senate amendments by agreeing to have the matter referred to a conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I take it that every conference committee will pay due attention to the expressed wishes of the House.

Mr. ELLIS. We want an unfettered conference, and to know the reason that influenced the action of the Senate in this matter. I have no disposition to say that the House may not concur in the amendments of the Senate at last. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] is correct in his statement concerning the necessity for prompt action of Congress in this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him long enough to say that the Committee on Appropriations gave every dollar that was asked for this purpose?

Mr. ELLIS. I have already so stated.

Mr. KASSON. For this particular tribe.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that no member of the Committee on Appropriations was opposed to giving for this purpose all that was asked. If it shall turn out that there was a mistake in the estimate which was laid before the committee, and that the amount asked for was not large enough, I am in favor of increasing the appropriation.

The principal objection I have to concurring in the amendments of the Senate, however, lies in the fact that if the second amendment be adopted it will then become necessary for the Department to advertise and to receive bids for furnishing these supplies, and thus cause delay in the use of the money for relieving these starving Indians. By force of the language in the amendment of the Senate, it would be absolutely necessary to advertise and obtain the goods required for the purpose of relieving these Indians.

Under the general statute the Department, finding that there is an emergency, may in its discretion purchase the goods and supply them at once. I think that amendment should be corrected in conference, so that the Department may be left to act under the general law.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course I disagree with these amendments, because I disagreed with the original joint resolution. But I hope the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will not be construed into allowing the Indian Bureau to spend this money without responsibility and without competition.

Mr. ELLIS. I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. I understand by the terms of this joint resolution as it comes before us that it is an exigency appropriation. With all deference to the members of the Committee on Appropriations I think the report shows that the Department recommends an appropriation of $138,000 for this purpose.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CHACE. But I will not object to this going to a conference. I only wish to say that in my judgment this is a case which demands the most prompt action possible.

These people are starving, dying; thousands of them are already dead. Why? Because they have been defrauded of their just rights by the Government of the United States. Two years ago this House made all haste to make an appropriation for the relief of starving men in the South. I insist that it is due to these Indians from us that we should lay aside a little of the red-tape that surrounds these cases and act immediately.

I will not oppose the reference of the subject to a conference committee, but I hope that the committee may act promptly and report the measure as soon as possible.

Mr. ELLIS. I now ask a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations moves non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate; but the gentleman from Montana Territory [Mr. MAGINNIS] moves——

Mr. MAGINNIS. I withdraw the motion. I only made it for the purpose of calling attention to the necessity for speedy action.

The motion of Mr. ELLIS to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back the resolution which I send to the desk with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to this House such information as he may be able to communicate at an early day in regard to the trade between the United States and Mexico and to the traffic over railroads connecting the two countries.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to make a statement. I ask consent to make a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs which ought to have been presented yesterday, but which was prevented from coming in because I was necessarily absent.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive the report.

There was no objection.

GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2265) to equalize the rank of graduates of the Naval Academy upon their assignment to the various corps; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that yesterday the call of committees was interrupted by the arrival of the hour fixed for the funeral services, and that when the call was suspended the Committee on Invalid Pensions was submitting reports. I had a report to present.

The SPEAKER. The call rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on last Tuesday, when bills were introduced, I was confined to my room by illness. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time two bills for reference.

There was no objection.

JOSEPHINE D. HELLYER.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4378) for the relief of Josephine D. Hellyer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

W. W. FRYBARGER.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4379) for the relief of W. W. Frybarger; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to report back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the pay of the clerks to committees of the House of Representatives which have been or may be hereafter authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time such clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of the several committees employing clerks for the session only; and the pay of the assistant riding page and of the telephone page, heretofore authorized by the House to be employed, shall begin on the 3d day of December, 1883.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STONE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether it is in order at this time to correct a wrong reference inadvertently made.

The SPEAKER. If the matter relates to the improper reference of a bill the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STONE. The bill (H. R. 776) for the relief of the heirs of Nicolas and Marc Antoine Fouquet was inadvertently referred to the Committee on War Claims. I ask that the reference be changed to the Committee on Claims, to which the bill was referred in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the change of reference will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and is the call of committees, which will be resumed where the call was interrupted yesterday.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. PAYSON. I move, by unanimous consent, that the morning hour for the reception of reports from committees be dispensed with for to-day.

The SPEAKER. It requires two-thirds to dispense with the morning hour.

The House divided; and the Speaker decided the noes had it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 60.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAYSON and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, were appointed.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to know of the gentleman who made this motion whether this committee was not passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 54.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the motion was not agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. Committees will now be called for reports, beginning with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ROBERT M. FLACK.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3669) granting a pension to Robert M. Flack; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NELLY ROBERTS.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1142) granting a pension to Nelly Roberts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DILENO ROBINSON.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2251) to increase the pension of Dileno Robinson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH R. BENJAMIN.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 2027) for the relief of Joseph R. Benjamin, and moved its reference to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH DAWSON.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back adversely the petition of Joseph Dawson, praying the donation of $10,000 in lieu of a pension; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORMSBY BLANDING.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back adversely, without prejudice, the bill (H. R. 1471) granting a pension to Ormsby Blanding; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANNA LINDBLOM.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Pensions, also moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Anna Lindblom for a pension, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back adversely the following cases; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

Petition of L. W. Linkin for a pension; and

A bill (H. R. 1743) granting a pension to Mathias Fosher.

SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report back and move that they be laid upon the table the bills which I send up to the Clerk's desk, and this action is taken because the committee have agreed upon a general bill covering the matters referred to in these several cases.

The bills are as follows:

L. S. ENSEL.

Mr. MOULTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 191) for the relief of L. S. Ensel; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. MOULTON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 219) to amend sections 38 and 39 of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes relating to the compensation of Members and Delegates in cases of contested elections; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. STEELE. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a number of bills and petitions with reference to removing the charge of desertion, and to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and at the same time to report a substitute.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done. The bills can be reported adversely and the general bill can be reported as a new bill.

Mr. STEELE. We desire to report back these bills and petitions without prejudice and ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The only parliamentary report the gentleman can make is to report against those bills and report another bill to the House.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I suggest that as many members have introduced bills to remove the charge of desertion the substitute, for the information of the House, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that it be printed in the RECORD.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave voluntarily returned to his command and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier who has not received a certificate of discharge it shall be the duty of the Adjutant-General of the United States to issue to such soldier, or, in case of his death, to his heirs or legal representatives, a certificate of discharge.

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence: And provided further, That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldiers, who served in the Army a period of less than six months shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with adverse recommendations, without prejudice, the following bills and petitions; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 1160) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Adam Winter;
